The Bonus Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT C. PELL, JR.,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 1, 1920.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against the bonus. I am doing this in the full realization that it means the end of my political career, and I can tell you frankly that it is a painful thing to commit suicide, but I do not think that honor will permit me to follow any other course.

Of course, I shall vote for the most generous treatment possible for men that have been injured in the service of the United States, and also for proper care of the dependents of those men who have been killed, but I can not bring myself merely for consideration of political advantage to vote for a bill which would impose a tax of $20 a head on every man, woman, and child in the country. There is no conceivable way—or, at least, no way has been suggested—by which such an amount of money could be raised which would not paralyze the industries of the United States and precipitate such a crisis as we have never seen in our history. Hard times unquestionably are coming, whatever we may do, but while we can not avert difficulties, we can tremendously aggravate them.

So far there have been three plans suggested of raising the money. First, by the issue of $2,000,000,000 of bonds, which obviously could not possibly be marketed at a rate very much under 8 per cent, which would promptly knock 20 points off the price of Liberty bonds and make any private borrowing by business men practically impossible. Second, a retroactive tax on incomes for at least three or four years. Ordinary common sense will show any man that this money has not been kept by the individuals who acquired it in the form of cash in their stockings, but has been spent or invested, and to raise the tax money every business man in the country would be obliged to go into the money market and borrow on his own credit. This also would run the price of money up to such an extent that the permanent investment rate in the United States would remain somewhere around 8 per cent for a great many years. Of course, I mean nonspeculative investments, the class of thing that before the war paid from three and a half to four and a half per cent.

The third system is a general sales tax of one-half of 1 per cent on all sales made in the country. The argument for this is that it would take the money from the people in such small installments that they would not notice it, but it would be impossible to take such an enormous sum from the community without very seriously affecting all business throughout the country, and, of course, it would wreck the financial district of New York, and with it the hope of commercial preeminence of the world. An American stock exchange would probably be opened in London on which all stocks listed on New York would be dealt in. This would mean that London would become the great market of the world for call money, and would end any hope that we may have held in the past of New York becoming the financial capital of the world.

Considering the low purchasing power of money to-day, and also the general tendency of all classes toward extravagance, $500 means about as much to a boy to-day as seventy-five or a hundred would have meant to us, and we may rest assured that nine-tenths of the men receiving this money will spend it on a good time and not work until it is all gone. After that they will try to get back the jobs that they held, and find that they no longer exist, so that their last state will be worse than the first.

The country is laboring under too many laws, too many taxes, too much interference, too much government. The only remedy suggested is more legislation and more expenditures. What we really want is a return to the old American principle that the best government is the least government. We must realize that it is not the business of Congress to protect the class from the community, but to protect the community from each class and to guarantee a fair field and no favors. The right principle on which to conduct our public affairs is continuously to strive to give to the individual all the freedom that we possibly can consistent with the public safety, and to return to the period when the American people relied on themselves and on their own intelligence and industry rather than on assistance from the Government. Let every one bake his pie as he pleases and let the Government keep its fingers out.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES O'CONNOR,
OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 10, 1920.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the bonus bill and matters I deem relevant thereto I freely concede to the other Members of this House what I hope will be granted unto me—sincerity of purpose and a desire to meet a grave question patriotically. No man possesses the inflexible touchstone of truth, and men equally honest, intelligent, and sincere will differ widely as to the methods that should be adopted to secure the results desired in this and all other cases that will arise and which will demand settlement now or in the years to come. The World War has released new emotions, new ideas pent up in the mind of man for years. His vision is enlarged, and he has a firmer grasp upon the rights of man and the obligation of government than ever before in history. The trials and the sufferings of that dreadful conflict which staggered the world and deluged it in blood and tears have moved him rapidly along the road to a newer day. Broadened in mind by humanity's Golgotha, he is intellectually a giant, his phenomenal mental growth during the last five years making for a profound conviction that democracy is something more than any former conception. Many of the old definitions and expressions of democracy are regarded to-day as tinkling cymbals and sounding brass. He is looking eagerly forward to the glory of the coming day that was so colorfully and beautifully painted by the word artists that held the literary stage during the years of the tremendous crisis from which the world has just emerged. The war caused a revolution in the soul of man. His newborn attitude is compelling, necessitating a change in the thought that has obtained for so long with reference to the rights and privileges, duties and obligations of the different constituents and phases of society.

Running parallel with this tremendous movement of the soul have come demands making for vast expenditures that would have staggered the banking world in times gone by, demands that have created a financial and economic situation and problems that press for solution yet apparently baffle the skill and thought of the best political economists and experts of the time. Leaders of one school of thought inform us that it is necessary to starve, freeze, go in rags, wear battered hats and worn-out shoes in order to get back to a living basis and prevent the rapidly mounting costs of existence, forgetful that such a course would inevitably lead to the closing of factories and mines; depressing agriculture and commerce at a time when both are in the fight for world markets, and, if anything, require stimulants instead of narcotics. The result of any condition making for the unemployment of our laboring host and wage earners is appalling to the mind and is a complete answer to those misguided souls and sesquipedalian political economists that would earn heaven by making earth a hell. It is usually this school of economists that assert when prices are low and men without the means to secure the necessaries of subsistence that their ills and sufferings are due to overproduction. Between overproduction and underproduction the wage earner is squeezed until he cries out for relief, and his cry at this time is for something more than a mere statement of that which is pretended to be the law, which is said to govern inexorably and which is phrased in the one-time satisfactory maxium of "the law of demand and supply." That law has been suspended if not aborted by reason of new conditions and situations which have not been mastered and controlled by remedial legislation. "They shall take who have the power; they shall keep who can," is susceptible of many applications to present-day conditions. But man has grown and does not want to continue an economic system that means if he succeeds in avoiding the rocks of Scylla he shall be submerged in the whirlpools of Charybdis. He is now demanding a scientific system of taxation that will yield sufficient for a big national life, great road building, an extension of the school system, and make for a more equal and equitable distribution of the wealth produced by the generation in which he was born and of which he is a unit. The irrepressible conflict between poverty and riches is on more strenuously to-day than ever before. America refuses to adopt the roll of pauper in order to get back to what parlor economists are pleased to call a living basis. The grand destiny of this Republic will not be accomplished until we are free not only politically but commercially, agriculturally, industrially—free from the heartache and the agony of poverty and the terrors of old age; free from illiteracy and ignorance and the haunting dread of the appalling trials that confront the toiler in the evening of his life. Larger salaries, comfortable homes, good food, and drinking water demand more thought now from the statesmen than ever before in the record of statecraft. Our soldiers, our sailors, school-teachers, ministers, clerks, wage earners, laborers must be given a decent living wage; it can be done or our boasted civilization is a delusion.

The American knows that it can be accomplished; he insists that a system that makes for poverty in the face of plenty unto profusion and prosperity and fatness in times of scarcity of the fundamentals of life should be extirpated root and branch. His voice is heard aloud in the land now and then raised in shrill or raucous tones; but above this uproar is felt the silent thought of millions of Americans who look confidently to Congress, the greatest legislative body in the world, for an answer to the mute but patriotic demands for relief—"to do noble things, not dream them all day long."

ABOUT TO MEET THE TEST.

"The shallows murmur but the deeps are dumb." We are about to meet the first acid test as to whether or not we are responsive to the great obligations that rest upon us crying for a discharge that will answer the soul, the patriotism, and the promise of America. The adjusted compensation requested for our soldier boys by the American Legion, the organized articulate expression of our gallant youths who offered their young lives to meet their country's need, is one of these obligations. We must not fail in our duty; we shall not fail. I know that if the wage earners and the poor of our land did not know that there was a more just way of securing the funds to meet the requests of our boys they would deem it an honor and a glorious privilege to bear the tax, even if it were burdensome enough to bend them to the earth, for the boys are bone of their bone, flesh of their flesh, and blood of their blood. But the toiling masses of the land will regard it as a shirking of duty by those who were born with a silver spoon in their mouth and rocked in a golden cradle, by those who have always been arrayed in purple and fine linen and who have dwelt in marble halls and palaces, to evade a tax which they, and they alone, should bear, a tax which they should deem a privilege and an honor to discharge, because it would be borne for the sake of a true and exalted patriotism. "Dulce et decorum est pro patria mort." If it be sweet and honorable to die for one's country, how much sweeter for the affluent and the rich man to assume an obligation of his country rather than cast it upon the hewer of wood and the drawer of water.

The Republican majority in this House are in a position to determine where the great obligation of meeting our soldiers' request rests and who should discharge it. They have the power to say whether it shall be Dives or Lazarus. If they determine to burden Lazarus and let Dives continue to roll in the chariot of boundless wealth; if by a rule they preclude us from relieving the poor who have had to beg for the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table, the low and the humble will proudly do their duty, but will long remember, not soon forget, the Republican Party, and will work its woe and pillory it for many a year to come. Yes, my countrymen, we are face to face with one of the great acid tests that will be applied by the American people to their national lawmaking body. If we fail them in this instance, well may they ponder upon the ingratitude of governments; well may they ask the question of themselves, "What if the war had lasted two years longer and had cost 3,000,000 lives and more than a hundred billions of treasure?" For never forget that was the price that thoughtful Americans believed we would have to pay to keep the world from staggering to its destruction and fall, its passing over into chaos before it would take the final plunge, and rest in oblivion with the mighty civilizations that have come and gone and are now no more.

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide
In the strife of truth with falsehood, for the good or evil side;
Some great cause, God's new Messiah offering each the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand and the sheep upon the right,
And that choice goes by forever 'twixt that darkness and that light.

We are indeed on the firing line. Great problems will have to be met and solved now and in the future. Vast sums are required and will have to be exacted in order to meet the pressing needs of Government and the new order. Huge appropriations will have to be made to meet the interest and provide for the amortization of the war debt and provide for the national defense. Great internal improvements will soon be demanded by the people and other large governmental expenditures may result from the new life. A system of taxation will have to be devised to secure the enormous funds that will be required to meet the exactions of an advanced civilization, and these funds must come from those who have been favored by nature and society in such a manner that they have been able to gather unto themselves shining piles of gold. First of all, we must pass the bonus bill and with that duty well performed we shall be heartened to move forward to grapple with other problems that will make our country indeed a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. "The reward of one's duty well performed is the power to discharge another."

The money to meet this bonus bill and other great measures must come from war profits and an adequate collateral inheritance tax, subject to State inheritance tax, and a Federal tax on the holding of land, urban, agricultural, coal, oil, mineral, timber, water power, and so forth, valued, irrespective of improvements, at over $10,000. Our first duty is to meet this demand of the moment. We must pass a bonus bill. A failure to do so would be looked upon as a refusal to make good the glowing promises made to our brave boys during the months that elapsed between the declaration that a state of war existed between the German Empire and the United States of America and the day on which the armistice was signed.

I reiterate that we can not place this burden upon the toiling masses of our country without arousing a suspicion as to our sincerity, without creating the chance of a resentful feeling between and among the soldier boys and the masses of their countrymen that love them so well, without the risk of severing the affectionate ties that bind our boys and girls who earn their bread to the doughboys who lived and suffered in camp and in trench for the honor and glory of their country, its past and its present, its living and its dead. We must not do anything that would act as a wedge between those who were willing to die for us and their countrymen who would enshrine the soldier lad in his memory as long as life lasts. We could not do so without forgetting the past, without ignoring what the future may hold in store for us. Again on some tremendous day, even in the near future, we may have to issue the clarion call for the boys to assemble once more to meet an enemy, an invader, in the event that our naval force is not sufficient to cope with those that might assail us by combination from the two oceans. Again we may expect them to answer the trumpet call of patriotic duty to maintain the glory of those illustrious spirits that fought, bled, and died in each generation in the life of America for its ideals, hopes, and aspirations.

We must pass a bill that will command the approbation of the masses of our people—the farm boy, the clerk, the wage earner, the hewer of wood and drawer of water, the laborer who with pick and shovel earns his bread and pays his rent in the sweat of his brow. We can not add to his burden. He is already bending to the earth. The country would not accept as an evidence of statesmanship the bill proposed. If enacted into law it would widen the ridge that now exists and make it a gulf whose waters would flow with bitterness. Let us be just to the soldier. We owe him that which we can never pay.

Lest we forget, let us turn back the hand of time; let us roll up the curtain upon the dreadful tragedy that began on August 1, 1914, when a madman, bearing aloft the torch of militarism, started out to set this world on fire. England and France were to be put to the sack and then our own country was to be given to the flames. Subject to his will was the mightiest army that this world has ever known; trained as were never trained the phalanxes of Alexander that swept over the Asiatic world and sent dynasties and empires into oblivion; trained as never were trained the Roman legions whose all conquering spirit subdued the nations of the earth and brought back to Rome as captives princes and queens bound to the chariots that rolled into the Forum over the Appian Way, which connected Rome with the uttermost parts of the empire; trained as never were trained the Carthaginian hosts who, under the inspiring leadership of one of the foremost geniuses of any age, scaled the Alps and caused Rome to tremble when the Roman heart was a tiger heart and the Roman matron was a lioness for her country, her children, and her gods; trained as were never trained the children of the desert who, behind Mohamet, swept over Asia and Europe, changing not only manners and customs but even the religion of the lands that fell before his invincible march; trained as were never trained the legions that sang their war songs under the leadership of Napoleon, who carried the eagles of France over a hundred battle fields and made his name immortal as one who waded through slaughter to a throne and shut the gates of mercy on mankind. For 40 years this engine of war that was put into motion on that never-to-be-forgotten day, August 1, 1914, was in the making. Aye, it had been in the blood of Germany from the days of Frederick the Great, of whom Macaulay said that in order to betray a friend, whom he had sworn to protect and defend, black men slew each other off the coast of Coromandel and red men scalped one another by the Great Lakes of North America. On the signal this perfected military juggernaut moved on its road for the destruction of civilization. Belgium went down in the twinkling of an eye and northern France was laid in the dust. Serbia, Albania, Montenegro, and Roumania reeled, tottered, went to their destruction and fall; western Russia was torn into fragments and hundreds of thousands driven across Siberia and whose wanderings did not cease until they reached China; northern Italy was swept as if stricken by a West Indian hurricane; England and France were slowly going to their knees.

The submarine, the monster of the deep, was strewing the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean with their ships and foodstuffs. A terrible cry for help came over the seas to us. We heard it and simultaneously realized the appalling danger that menaced our own land. Suddenly the terrible truth burst upon our minds. If England and France were beaten to their knees and had to surrender their navies as a condition precedent to peace, Germany with these acquired fleets and her own could and would sweep us from the seas as mist goes before the sun, and with airplanes sent from the decks of her war vessels bring fire, explosion, and destruction to the cities of the north Atlantic, and, in acordance with the best military experts, land upon our coast in six weeks 600,000 trained troops equipped with the best war machinery known to any age and fresh from the conquest of Europe. It is true indeed, my friends, that had the god of war willed it so we would have met the invader and fought him for a generation until we had driven him from our shores, but at what a terrible price, for while we know that Americans, all other things being equal, are superior in valor and ability to any other people on earth, they would not have been on an equal footing with the invader as a result of inexperience at the bloody game of war. With a thrill of horror the thoughtful men of the country recognized that during the making of this German Moloch we had been sleeping in a fool's paradise. But with that realization came a surge of patriotism that swept from ocean to ocean, reuniting the people of the North and South and making for a union which had been the dream of patriots and statesmen for half a century; a surge of patriotism that showed we were one people—divided only as the waves, but one as the sea. With the declaration that a state of war existed as a result of continued affronts and insults and our own consciousness that we were to be the next victim, as no conqueror ever stops until he is stopped by superior force, the genius of the country, with sweep and speed, swept on our activities and made for an army which won the day, preserving civilization and glorifying American arms with a glory that shall never fade while fame her records keep or honor points the spot where valor proudly sleeps. Sixteen cantonments, modern cities as it were, sprang into existence overnight. There were trained our boys; there many met their doom and wrote out the last chapter in their histories; from there they went out over our land and across the seas and into the trenches of northern France, and then over the top and to victories that will cause America's heart to thrill with pride until time is no more.

But we paid the price—in the blood of our soldiers, in the tears of our women, and what we thought least of at that time, the treasure of our fabulous wealth. From North and South, East and West the boys came and went to yield their lives as a holocaust to their country's need. The country was one in the great sacrifice that it was about to make and did make. Listen to these lines, which ought to be in every schoolhouse in America; they express the thought which is in the heart of every boy and girl in this broad land of ours:

Here's to the Blue of the wind-swept North
As they will meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of Grant be with them all
As the sons of the North advance.

And here's to the Gray of the sun-kissed South
As they'll meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of Lee be with them all
As the sons of the South advance.

And here's to the Blue and Gray as one
As they'll meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of God be with them all
As the sons of our flag advance.

America is a temple of sorrow. Columbia mourns for her children because they are not. France, hitherto the playground of the world, is now sacred soil to America. There our dead rest. Rude wooden crosses dot the shell-scarred battle field; each simple cross marking the grave of an American soldier who died in France in defense of the America he loved and those dear to him. We had to suffer our spiritual agony; we could not be spared. Like Europe, we had to toil painfully the weary road to Calvary. It is true that the boys are back; all except our sainted dead. The boys that are back look across the waves with a holy vision to the last, sad, silent resting place of their comrades in arms with a noble resolution that should another call come for service of the highest order they will go out again under the banners of our country—the flag of our Republic—giving up life if necessary and joining the gallant spirits that have gone before and who are on fame's eternal camping ground with the bivouac of the dead. The boys are back in large numbers, thank God! We owe them as much as if that war had lasted two years longer and when undoubtedly the toll exacted would have been millions of our young men and incalculable treasure. Did we not believe that it would last until 1921? Did we not believe that it would cost rivers of blood and oceans of tears? Did we not believe that it would exhaust our granaries and storehouses, and were we not willing to pay the price? We said we were and, by the God of Nations, that word and that vow must be kept! Whatever demand our soldier boys make we must yield, we must concede. They are the judges of what is just and proper, not ourselves, for whom they fought and bled, whose comrades died and whose women in tears and in sorrow mourned for those that will never come back. The bonus must be paid, and it shall come not from the sweat of the poor man's brow but it shall come from the bursting coffers of the rich man; it shall come from the swollen fortunes of the war lords and profiteers whose millions came from shot and shell; it shall come from the necrophile, whose safes are bursting with gold secured with the priceless treasure of American blood. And when that ill-gotten gold mine fails us we shall go after collateral inheritances, so that wealth shall not be piled up and become a menace to our liberties. If we have to be ruled, it will be by flesh and blood like ourselves and not by the power of money, that makes tyrants and slaves of those who possess it and afflicts and terrorizes and robs of manhood those whom it brutalizes and rules. The war has ended, but it has released new emotions. Its agonies must be paid for, but paid for by those who suffered not. The Old World is a thing of the past. It was a world where toil for myriads of honest men and women purchased nothing better than squalor, penury, anxiety, and wretchedness; a world scarred by slums and disgraced by sweating, where unemployment through the vicissitudes of industry brought despair to multitudes of humble homes; a world where side by side with want there was waste of the inexhaustible riches of the earth, partly through ignorance and want of forethought, partly through intrenched selfishness.

If we renew the lease of that world we shall betray the heroic dead. We shall be guilty of the basest perfidy that ever blackened a people's fame. The irrepressible conflict is on, I repeat. The people of this country are determined not to starve, freeze, and wear battered hats, worn-out shoes, and ragged clothes in the land of their birth when that land is a land of milk and honey—a land of plenty unto profusion—in order that a relatively few may roll in wealth, live in palaces, rock their children in golden cradles, and oppress a hundred million with an instrument far more cruel than the sword. The American people are going to live decently, and the surplus wealth of the country will yield to the taxing power and pay the expenses of Government and the care of the soldiers who were willing to die for their country and the families of those who did die for it. A hundred million Americans would starve if it were necessary in the defense of their land, but they will refuse to go in rags while the pampered few stroll through life in golden raiment. They will refuse to starve and go without shoes in order that a relatively few of their countrymen may acquire that dominion which means the enslavement of the masses of the country. We put down the autocrat of the world more powerful than Genghis Khan or Attila, whose boast was that the grass never grew where the hoof of his war horse trod. We are going to curb the mighty power of money and make it serve the needs of our country and prevent it from becoming a monster of oppression, of tyranny, and slavery. I reiterate, the irrepressible conflict is on. The dawn of a new order is here. The old order is rapidly disappearing. Those who believe in equal rights for all and special privileges for none, who believe that the wealth of the land should be so distributed as to bring about the general welfare, will press on the fight, knowing that victory will be theirs, knowing that no question is ever settled until it is settled right.

However the battle is ended, though proudly the victor comes,
With fluttering flags and prancing nags and the echoing roll of drums,
Still truth proclaims this motto in letters of living light,
No question was ever settled until it was settled right.

Oh man, bowed down by labor; oh woman, young yet old;
Oh hearts oppressed in the toilers' breast and crushed by the power of gold,
Keep up with your weary battle against triumphant might,
For no question was ever settled until it was settled right.

Under which King Bezonians? Under the banners of war, wealth, and privilege or under the flag of union, justice, and confidence, the flag of the patriot, living and dead, the flag of the United States, the flag for which poverty has always fought, the flag that has always been and always will be, I trust, "the rainbow to the storms of life, the evening beam that smiles the clouds away."

Fuller Pension Law.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, May 14, 1920.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the privilege accorded me by the House of Representatives to extend my remarks upon the subject of the Fuller pension law, approved May 1, 1920. This is such a statute as I have long desired to see written into our books. It applies not alone to the veterans of the Civil War and their widows, but as well to the Army nurses of that war and to the dependent parents and children of its veterans. It is regrettable that legislative exigencies compelled the restoration by the Senate of the date of marriage required for Civil War widows to June 27, 1905, instead of advancing it as the House bill originally provided to 1915. Since the earlier date was fixed, many women have married and well and faithfully cared for our Civil War veterans, and it is unthinkable to attribute to their so doing any selfish motive. They are justly entitled for this sort of care of our wars' veterans, which money can not purchase but which the Government should encourage by such means as it may, to the bounty of the widow's pension. I hope to see an early enactment to do full justice in this behalf. This law also applies to the widows of veterans of the War of 1812, of whom in the course of nature a scant few remain; to the soldiers of the Mexican War having 60 days' service, and widows of such soldiers.

In order that the matter may be widely published, Mr. Speaker, I wish to incorporate here the analysis of the law which has been furnished to Members by the Commissioner of Pensions. The law provides pensions at rates per month as follows:

WAR OF 1812.

1. To widow of one who served in War of 1812	$30

WAR WITH MEXICO.

2. To one who served 60 days or more and honorably discharged	50

4. To widow of one who served 60 days or more and honorably discharged	30

CIVIL WAR.

5. To one who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States and honorably discharged	50
6. To one who served less than 90 days, discharged for disability incurred in service in line of duty, in receipt of or entitled to pension or on pension roll as a Civil War veteran	50

8. To one who in service in line of duty lost—
(a) One hand or one foot or totally disabled in same	60

(c) Married once or more than once after death of soldier or sailor husband if subsequent marriage has been dissolved by death, or divorce without fault on her part	30
10. To widows above mentioned for each child under 16 years of age of officer or enlisted man, additional	6
11. To child or children under 16 years of age of such officer or enlisted man, in case of death or remarriage of widow, the whole pension.

13. To dependent parents, Civil War	30

HOW TO OBTAIN THE BENEFITS.

The Pension Bureau will take steps promptly to make effective the provisions of the law.

No declaration will be required from those now on the roll and mentioned in foregoing clauses Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9 (a), 10, 11, 12, and 13.

Declarations will be required in every case for original pension; also in claims under clauses 3, 7, 9 (b), and 9 (c).

Where a declaration is required, pension, if allowed, will begin from the date of filing; under clauses 3 and 7 pension, if allowed, will commence when the disability is shown to exist after approval of this act.

Where no declaration is required, increase of pension will commence from date of approval of said act.

Where a remarried widow filed an application under the act of September 8, 1916, pension, if allowed, will commence when her original application was filed. In all such cases the claimant should notify the Pension Bureau by letter or otherwise.

Claim agent or attorney not to be recognized except in claims for original pension, and in such cases not more than $10 shall be paid for services, and only on order of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Declarations will be furnished on request.

Payments at the increased rates will be made at the date of the quarterly payment due July 4, August 4, and September 4, 1920, to those then entitled, and thereafter regularly. Earlier payment can not be made on account of necessary labor and changes.

Cooperative Live-Stock Shipping.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. KING,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 11, 1920.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the permission extended to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I desire to submit an article by Mr. John T. Montgomery, farm adviser of Henry County, Ill., as printed in the Geneseo Republic on April 30, 1920, on the subject of cooperative shipping of live stock, so that other communities situated similarly may be benefited.

The article is as follows:

Some interest in the volume of cooperative shipping of live stock has led to the compilation of the totals of this work in Henry County, Ill.

Eleven associations shipped 994 cars of stock, approximately 6,570 head of cattle, 188,145 head of hogs, and 4,300 head of sheep, a total of 158,515 head. The proceeds from these sales, less freight, yardage, and commissions, totals $2,869,153.42. Part of the associations did not report a full year's business, because they were organized during the year.

These figures, however, indicate the general approval of Henry County farmers of the cooperative marketing of live stock. From nothing a few years ago this project has developed to quite a respectable business. Osco Association was the first to start, with Galva and Cambridge soon after. Now 13 associations are making fine progress, 2 having started since the beginning of the year. Two or three more communities are developing a sentiment toward organization, and in all probability every farmer in the county may avail himself of the help of the association at his station before the year closes.

The older associations had many handicaps, and at times worked under serious difficulties. Car shortages and unfair distribution of cars during the past two seasons have hindered progress. It is hoped that the return to normal shipping conditions will make it possible for the associations to obtain cars more readily.

We are not able to say how many dollars cooperative shipping has saved farmers of the county, but all believe the sum to be quite considerable. The feeling is universal that buyers have been obliged to pay much better prices to obtain stock. A number of buyers have quit or begun service as managers of the associations. Farmers feel that shipping through their association brings them all the market pays when the stock arrives, and are right well satisfied with this method of shipping.

The officers and managers of the various associations have organized a county federation with headquarters at the farm bureau office. In their meetings improvement of the service and problems of conducting the business are discussed and appropriate action taken. Some very important changes in methods of handling and selling are being worked out. Some have been turned over to the Illinois Agricultural Association for action. So that this little federation is doing a real service to cooperative shipping and to farmers and feeders at large.

The ability to conduct their own business in marketing and to work together is being developed among Henry County farmers to a marked degree, and proceeding carefully along chosen lines. Prospects for continued and broader development are bright indeed.

Civil-War Pensions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 25, 1920.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have held since the Civil War that soldiers' pensions should be based on service or wounds or disability, but this policy was abandoned in 1907 by a Republican Congress, when Civil War soldiers were pensioned on account of age. Later, by act of May, 1912, known as the Sherwood Act, pensions were granted on the basis of length of service and age. At the outset of the World War in 1917 a system of insurance was adopted by Congress on the recommendation of Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, which enabled a soldier to take out insurance to the aggregate of $10,000 by paying 10 per cent of the amount. This was the most generous system ever before adopted by Congress, and has proved by far the most expensive to the Government. It was stated on this floor that the cost of the system will aggregate about $350,000,000. This amount includes both insurance and compensation. The insurance for 1919 was $43,798,000 and $85,000,000—officially estimated—for 1920. The War Risk Insurance Bureau is unable to give at this date the cost of compensation for 1920, but for both insurance and compensation, vocational training, and hospital services the aggregate this year, according to figures furnished me by Chairman GOOD, of the Appropriations Committee, will be $360,000,000. This is $254,000,000 more than the entire cost to the Government in pensions for soldiers of the Civil War nine years after the close. This does not take into account either the $60 bonus paid to the soldiers at the close or the proposed bonus provided in a bill now pending. When we reflect that the battle fatalities of the soldiers of the Civil War exceed the battle fatalities—killed and fatally wounded—of the United States soldiers of the World War, we are better enabled to estimate the cruel injustice and ingratitude meted out in stinginess to the soldiers of the Union Army.

In the session of Congress, 1873–74, Congressman Garfield, then chairman of the Appropriation Committee, stated on the floor of this House that the entire appropriation for pensions for Civil War soldiers that year was $26,000,000. We had during the four years from 1861 to 1865, according to official report, 2,212,474 soldiers, volunteers and drafted. Of this number only about 62,000 drafted men ever reached the battle front. I rejoice that there exists to-day a more generous spirit toward the soldiers of the World War than prevailed at the close of the Civil War. The 1861 to 1865 veterans were treated with cold neglect by Congress and the recognition of their services was confined to laudatory resolutions by civic societies and political conventions commending their valor and sacrifices and by making Gen. Grant President and selecting many service officers to State and local offices. But the men who stood behind the guns and did the hardest work of war were turned out in cold neglect like a worn-out dray horse.

It was 14 years after the war, when a Democratic House of Representatives was elected, that any adequate legislation was enacted to take care of those who were wounded or disabled in the service. Nowhere, where hearts are human, can this cruel neglect of the veterans of the Union Army be justified. And no true soldier of that desperate war wants the same cold-blooded neglect extended to the young soldiers of the World War.

It has been constantly asserted in press and forum by Republican exploiters of patriotism that nearly all of the liberal pension legislation for the benefit of the soldiers of the Civil War has been enacted by the Republican Party.

I desire here to present the record showing how utterly fallacious this claim is. I submit the following laws enacted by the Democrats, which is a complete answer to this charge, and should be satisfactory to all patriotic citizens of all political parties:

"1. Act of August 15, 1876, providing for the issuance of artificial limbs, or commutation therefor, to disabled soldiers and seamen, and providing transportation for the purpose of having the same properly fitted.

"2. Act of February 28, 1877, increasing the pension of those who lost both an arm and a leg.

"3. Act of March 9, 1878, granting pensions on account of service in the War of 1812 and the Revolutionary War, requiring a service of but 14 instead of 60 days on the part of the survivors of the War of 1812, and granting pensions to widows, regardless of the date of marriage to soldiers of this war. It also granted pensions to widows of soldiers of the Revolutionary War on a service of 14 days. Former laws required a marriage prior to the treaty of peace in the case of widows of the War of 1812.

"4. Act of June 17, 1878, increasing to $72 per month the pensions of those who lost both hands, both feet, or the sight of both eyes, incident to the service.

"5. Act of March 3, 1879, increasing to $37.50 all pensions on account of amputation at the hip joint. This sum was afterwards increased to $45 per month by a Democratic House.

"6. The next humane and generous pension laws were enacted January 25 and March 3, 1879, laws prepared by that gallant and enduring soldier and Congressman, Gen. Americus V. Rice, of Ohio. Gen. Rice lost his good right leg in that desperate charge on Kenesaw Mountain on June 27, 1864. This was the charge in which Gen. Harker, the poet-hero soldier, fell mortally wounded. This arrears-of-pension law, introduced and successfully piloted through a Democratic House by Gen. Rice, was at that time the most generous pension law ever enacted by any parliamentary body in the world. It gave increases to 225,000 wounded and disabled veterans, aggregating about $40,000,000. Previous to this time, as will be remembered, the Republicans had been in control of both branches of Congress for over 10 years.

"7. Act of June 21, 1879, abolishing biennial medical examinations and providing that in no case shall a pension be withdrawn or reduced except upon notice to the pensioner and a hearing upon sworn testimony.

"8. Act of June 16, 1880, giving $72 per month to all those who became totally helpless for any cause incident to the service.

"9. Act of February 26, 1881, for the protection of pensioners in the soldiers' homes.

"10. Act of July 14, 1892, establishing an intermediate rate of pensions between $30 and $72 per month and fixing the rate of $50 for all who require frequent and periodical, though not regular and constant, personal aid and attention.

"11. Act of August 5, 1892, granting pensions to Army nurses and forbidding the demanding of a fee by claim agents for prosecuting this class of cases. This was a generous recognition of the noble heroines who, leaving home and loved ones behind, in self-sacrifice braved pestilence and hardships to minister to the sick in the hospitals of the Army.

"12. Act of December 21, 1893, making a pension a vested right.

"Here are some other contributions to the pension laws which were either approved by a Democratic President or passed by a Democratic House of Representatives:

"13. Act of March 19, 1886, from $8 to $12 per month the pensions of 79,989 widows and dependents on the roll at the time as well as tens of thousands who have since been placed there. These certificates were issued by a Democratic Commissioner of Pensions without any expense or unnecessary delay to those deserving beneficiaries.

"14. Act of May 17, 1886, amending the reports of the War Department, which discriminated against a large and worthy class of soldiers, relieving thousands of unfortunate veterans of the hardships worked by the resting of charges against them, based upon technical errors in the records.

"15. Act of August 4, 1886, increasing the pensions of 10,030 cripples—armless and legless veterans.

"16. Act of January 29, 1887, benefiting about 30,000 survivors and widows of the Mexican War.

"17. Act of June 7, 1888, granting arrears to widows from the date of the death of the husband and providing that all United States officials authorized to administer oaths should administer all oaths required to be made in pension cases in the execution of vouchers for pensions free of charge. This arrearage act benefited at once more than 200,000 soldiers' widows.

"18. Act of August 27, 1888, increasing pensions on account of deafness.

"19. Act of February 12, 1889, granting an increase in pensions from $72 to $100 per month to all persons who lost both hands in the service and line of duty.

"20. Act of March 1, 1889, relating to the payment of pensions to the widows or dependent heirs where subsequent to the issuance of the check the pensioner dies.

"21. Act of March 2, 1889, removing certain technical charges in the record and relieving a large and meritorious class of soldiers.

"22. Act of March 2, 1895, which abolished the rates of $2 and $4 and fixed the lowest rate of pension at $6 per month.

"23. The next in order is the so-called dollar-a-day pension bill that I introduced in December, 1907, and which involved a struggle in committees and on the floor of the House of Representatives of over four years—the longest enduring and most notable struggle of any pension bill ever enacted since this Republic was born. It became a law on May 11, 1912.

"Let me here quote an extract from a speech I had the privilege of making on this floor February 26, 1908, when I presented those enormous petitions:

"I have here seven great rolls of petitions, each 500 feet long, from soldiers who fought the battles of the war. These petitions were prepared by the old soldiers themselves in their humble homes. Some have 20 names, some have 30, some have 40, and some have 100. There are only a few of these old stalwarts left in any locality. I have strung these local petitions together, and I will ask my friends to assist me in unrolling only one of them. You can see they are all headed differently and all prepared at home. Many of them are on cheap paper, written by trembling hands, in pencil. No two are alike. This, you see, is only one of seven of these great petitions. It has been unrolled and stretches up the aisle here to the back of this hall, around the railing, and back down another aisle. On both sides of this petition are the names of the old veterans of the war who fought the fiercest battles the world ever saw in the greatest war of all history. This petition and seven others like it bear the names of the men who enlisted under the call of Abraham Lincoln, whom we heard lauded to-day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dalzell]. These are the heroes who made Abraham Lincoln great and who unified this Nation.

"At this point of my address Congressman ASHBROOK, of Ohio, arose and said:

"I call attention to the fact that all but seven Members on the Republican side have left the Hall.

"I did not then and do not now feel that any Republican left the floor of the House because of any remarks I was making or of any disrespect to me, but because the subject of increased pensions to veterans did not appeal to his economic sense.

"24. The act of March 4, 1913, providing for automatic increase of pension under the act of May 11, 1912, on account of age and service, without further application on the part of the pensioner. This act was of very great service to soldiers.

"25. The act of September 8, 1916 (sec. 1), providing increase of pension for a widow who was the lawful wife of an officer or enlisted man during the period of his service in the Civil War, to $20 per month, and increasing to the same rate the pension of widows of veterans of the Civil War, the Mexican War, and the War of 1812, upon their attaining the age of 70 years.

"Section 2 of the same act provides restoration to the pension roll under certain conditions of widows dropped therefrom by reason of remarriage; also establishing title to original pension of certain other 'remarried widows.'

"Section 3 of the same act extends provisions of the act of April 19, 1908, to the widows of Civil War veterans who married the soldier or sailor prior to June 27, 1905.

"Records indicate that approximately 200,000 widows have benefited by the provisions of the act of September 8, 1916.

"Act of April 27, 1916, medal-of-honor law, introduced and piloted through the House by Congressman SHERWOOD, giving an additional pension of $10 per month to soldiers who have been awarded a medal of honor for having in action involving actual conflict with an enemy distinguished himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty.

"26. The act of March 4, 1917, providing pension of $20 per month, under certain conditions, to the survivors of certain Indian wars, and $12 per month to their widows.

"27. The act of October 6, 1917 (sec. 314), increasing to $25 per month the rate of pension of widows of officers or enlisted men who served in the Civil War, the War with Spain, or the Philippine insurrection, which placed on the roll at $25 per month approximately 284,000 widows.

"28. The act of June 10, 1918, providing a rate of pension ranging from a minimum of $30 to a maximum of $40 per month, depending on age and length of service; an amendment to the Sherwood dollar-a-day law of May 11, 1912.

"29. The act of July 16, 1918, provides a pension at the rate of $12 per month to widows (with $2 per month additional for each child under 16 years of age) of certain veterans of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign, who married the soldier or sailor prior to the passage of the act and whose net annual income, exclusive of their own manual labor, does not exceed $250 per year; and in case of death or remarriage of the widow extending the same benefit to children under 16 years of age."

I will not omit to credit the Republican majority for enacting the Fuller pension bill of May 1, 1920, a measure of appealing justice to the surviving veterans of the Civil War. It is not a measure to increase pensions but to equalize the pensions under previously existing law, and is so expressed in the title. The purchasing price of the circulating dollar, as measured by property and commodities, is now about 40 cents. Our normal money circulation is $19.50 per capita; it is now over $52 per capita. As money measures value, this enormous inflation is bound to jump prices in about equal proportion. This is inevitable. Hence the increase of a soldier's pension from $30 per month to $50 per month does not fully restore his financial aid to normal conditions, but it is as just and generous as the overburdened taxpayers can stand at this time.

I am presenting this record history to prove that patriotism is a common quality in our beloved America and that no party can claim a monopoly of that most sterling and vital element of American manhood—practical patriotism.

The Fuller bill, which was unanimously reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives, typifies my idea of practical patriotism. It gives to the fast-fading remnant of the gallant men who stood behind the guns a small token of our sense of gratitude to cheer their worn-out, weary lives.

McFadden Personal Rural-Credit Bill is Both Sound and Practical.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD E. RANDALL,

OF WISCONSIN.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 25, 1920.

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the personal rural-credit bill (H. R. 12678) introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] is both sound and practical, but so broad in its scope that one must limit his discussion to particular features of it. Therefore I shall confine my remarks to the general insurance feature, or, to be still more accurate, to certain phases of the insurance feature. I shall preface my discussion with the statement of the following propositions:

REASONS FOR FEDERAL GENERAL INSURANCE CHARTER OF M'FADDEN BILL.

Because general insurance is a necessary prerequisite to sound personal rural credit, especially so for farmers who have accumulated no property to pledge for loans obtained on the community guaranty.

Because if the league obtained a charter from a State it would be prohibited from doing business in some States, while other States would impose burdensome taxes on it.

Because it is optional with the rural-credit society to patronize the insurance league, thus forcing the league to furnish the maximum insurance service to the society at a minimum cost to get its business.

Because the fact that a big life insurance company was investing $7,200,000 of its wealth in the rural-credit paper and became a guarantor of each piece of that rural-credit paper, and selected the auditors of the rural-credit society, would do more to inspire public confidence in that paper than anything imaginable.

Because the life insurance company would furnish the capital for the branches of the rural-credit society at a lower dividend rate than any other financial institution.

Because the life insurance companies would be the most important market for rural-credit paper, and it should behoove the rural-credit society to do all within its power to acquaint those companies with the fact that its paper is sound and a fit investment for their trust funds, and the best means to that end is to permit the insurance league to choose its auditors. The society's directors who would reside in the several States, should and would welcome accurate information as to its management so as to apply the necessary corrective in case of abuses, as each of them is a guarantor of the credit of his community association.

Because some of the big life insurance companies are creating surplus capital at a greater rate than any other financial institutions in the country, and are, therefore, in a position to aid the rural-credit society by furnishing funds to loan to farmers.

Because the agents of the league would become the most useful factors in organizing the farmers into community associations, as they are trained in presenting financial problems.

Because the league must serve the farmers well and faithfully or else lose their insurance business, and Congress would refuse to extend its charter at the end of the first term.

Because the general insurance league would do more to reform the insurance business in this country than anything imaginable.

DISCUSSION OF FOREGOING PROPOSITIONS.

I shall not attempt to discuss the foregoing propositions in the order stated. Any system of personal rural credit, credit based on personal security, to be practical, should harmonize with the financial institutions and conform to the customs of the investing classes of the country in which it is to operate. In this respect the McFadden bill meets every requirement, and this is especially true of the insurance feature, as I shall proceed to show.

This bill purposes to create two Federal charters, one for a rural credit society and the other for a general insurance league, and it designates three commissioners to negotiate with a life insurance company possessing at least $400,000,000 assets, for the purpose of inducing it to surrender its State charter and accept and operate under the Federal general insurance charter. The latter charter, in addition to granting broad powers to do a general insurance business, imposes certain obligations on it toward the rural credit society, namely, it requires an investment of $7,200,000 of its assets in the rural credit system and provides that it shall choose the auditor and deputy auditors of the rural credit society.

Life insurance is distinctively an American institution, for even before the World War our people were buying yearly twice as much life insurance as the balance of the world, and it is estimated that we bought five or six times as much as the balance of the world in 1919. In financial stability no other corporation compares with that of a life insurance company, its status depending on the stable law of mortality. To illustrate, compare it with a bank. The obligations of a bank are payable principally on demand, and to destroy confidence in it means its financial ruin; whereas the insurance obligations of a life insurance company are deferred for years in the future and are payable upon the happening of a contingency—the death of its members—which operates with a uniformity approaching the fixed law of gravity, and to destroy public confidence in it means to strengthen it financially. This was demonstrated by the 1905 life insurance exposures, all of which companies are now paying larger dividends to policyholders than they did previous to such exposures, due in part to the loss of surplus of those who lapsed their policies.

Furthermore, a life insurance company accumulates surplus capital to an extent greater than any other class of corporations. For instance, in 1917 the difference between the income and disbursements of one of our companies was $93,979,874, all of which could safely have been invested in the paper of the proposed rural credit society. The fact that such a company was backing the rural credit society with $7,200,000 of its wealth, coupled with the further fact that it selected its auditors and thereby gained accurate information of its affairs, would do more to inspire confidence in the credit society than anything imaginable. There are times in the history of every credit institution, no matter how sound, in which they require an extension of time. If that capital were raised in driblets here and there, from Tom, Dick, and Harry of small means, that would amount to no more than their investments, but contributed by such a corporation, with accurate information, it would mean the multiplication of such security capital manyfold, and thereby give added strength to the rural credit society and at the same time work an economy in the capital requirement. No one has to be a financial expert to appreciate the force of this argument. All that is required is the application of a little common sense. I therefore unreservedly commend this insurance feature.

General insurance is absolutely essential to sound personal rural credit. It is the salvation of the poor man who has no property for loans obtained on the community guaranty. General insurance is not in vogue in the United States, simply because the laws of some of the States prohibit it, but it is a common thing in Europe. Many of the British insurance companies operate under general charters, some of which have been in operation for more than two centuries. I have had compiled from the 1918 Life Insurance Year Book a list of a few of the old British insurance companies, showing the different classes of insurance actually done by them. This list is incorporated in my remarks as Appendix I.

The bill does not force the rural credit society to patronize the insurance league. That is as it should be, for that will force the insurance league to furnish the rural credit society the maximum of insurance service at a minimum cost. In a few States we have some efficient mutual fire insurance companies, and it stands to reason that the rural credit society would patronize them unless the league furnished a superior service at a less cost. But such States are in a minority, and the mutual companies operating in each of them could not operate in other States without the consent of the officials of such other States. Some States would impose taxes which would be extremely burdensome. To illustrate this, I had the tax laws compiled from one of the strictly agricultural States, one which has not a single mutual fire insurance company. I refer to that as Appendix II. The license fees which the secretaries of the community associations of the rural credit society would have to pay would in some instances exceed the premiums received by them. Those local secretaries or scribes would not be general insurance agents but would merely act as agents to serve the members of the rural credit society. It is therefore preposterous to suppose that the Government would donate $25,000,000 capital and the franking privilege to the rural credit society and have some of the States impose such burdensome and confiscatory taxes on an instrumentality necessary to the success of the system. The only way to meet that situation is for Congress to create a general insurance league which may serve the rural credit society when called upon so to do by its board of directors.

HOW INSURANCE LEAGUE WOULD REFORM THE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

I will now discuss the insurance reforms which this general insurance charter would effect. Here again I must limit my discussion to a particular feature, namely, the system of self-inspection provided by that Federal general insurance charter. This system of self-inspection by public certified accountants has been thoroughly tried in Europe for many generations, and is far superior to our system of Government inspection of financial institutions. This is the system by which all the banks and insurance companies of England and France are inspected, and with them there does not occur such abuses in the management of trust funds as so frequently occur with us. This system of self-inspection is employed in inspecting the rural credit systems of most European countries. In proof of this let me quote from the excellent address of Wollemborg, the founder of the Italian personal rural credit system, to the rural credit commission we sent abroad in 1913. He said:

> But when the loans are strictly limited to people residing in the same locality all become vigilant and act as inspectors for their own protection. And you will find that inspection thus exercised by the members themselves is far superior to any Government inspection, since each man has rendered himself personally liable and is acting as inspector in his own behalf. As one of the farmers once said to me, "We are 100, all acting as spies on the others to see that nobody does anything wrong" (p. 26, S. Doc. 214, 2d sess., 63d Cong.).

Those were not the words of a rural credit theorist, but the greatest living authority on the subject, the man who actually founded the system in Italy 39 years ago, and has devoted his whole life to giving the Italian farmers the benefits of cooperative credit. We can not afford to ignore the advice of such experienced and practical patriots and thinkers as he has proven himself to be.

SUPERIORITY OF SELF-INSPECTION OVER GOVERNMENT INSPECTION EXPLAINED.

At the present time each of the 48 States and the District of Columbia has a separate system of Government inspection of the insurance companies operating in their respective territories. Those systems differ little in principle from each other, and as the legislatures of the States are responsible for the State inspection systems, I shall confine myself to the system provided for the District of Columbia, as Congress alone is responsible for it. There are 289 insurance companies and associations operating in the District of Columbia, with assets aggregating $7,721,083,376, which the insurance department of this district is supposed to report upon as to soundness and to advise the dear people that they are entitled to patronage. The annual appropriation for this insurance department is $13,000. If that appropriation were one hundred times what it is, that department could accomplish little more than it is now accomplishing under the system it is operating under, as I shall proceed to show.

In the first place, the average insurance commissioner is a novice in accountancy when selected to that office, and his selection is due more to the political pull he exercises on the appointive power than for a knowledge of accountancy. In the second place, there is no way by which an insurance commissioner can be promoted in that particular line of work. That is, when he becomes insurance commissioner he reaches the top of inspection work in his State. The desire to rise burns in the breast of every ambitious man, and that is a laudable desire, and if properly directed should be encouraged. But the average insurance commissioner is no sooner inducted into office than he begins looking about to see how he can advance himself, either in the political field or land some lucrative office with some insurance company he has been employed to inspect. The whole history of Government inspection of insurance demonstrates that that department is a kindergarten for political wirepullers and insurance officials.

Most of the shameful life-insurance scandals in the past have resulted from exposures from the inside, fights among officials over a division of the spoils. In 1891 it was Banta, the cashier of the New York Life, who exposed the Beers administration of that company to the New York Times, thus bringing about a legislative investigation. In 1905 it was Hyde and Alexander, high officials of the Equitable, who fell out and washed their dirty linen in public, which brought forth the Armstrong investigating committee, which employed Judge Charles E. Hughes as counsel. The mismanagements disclosed by those two investigations existed for years without a word of complaint from any of the many insurance departments. Some people may labor under the delusion that the laws enacted as a result of the Armstrong investigation have righted everything. But they should remember that only three years ago the Pittsburgh Life & Trust was exposed and its officials have been sent to the penitentiary for robbing it, and the investigation showed it to have been insolvent for five years before the exposure. Yet all that time it was operating in the District of Columbia and 21 of the most important insurance States of the Union, and those 22 insurance departments were each year issuing to it a clean bill of health or permit to do business in their respective territories. Why, it was only last year that the general agents of one of the big mutual companies went to the home office at the annual election and turned out the old president because his son was too free in the sale of securities to the company. Those general agents did not propose to have their business ruined by giving publicity to that fact. So they took time by the forelock and deposed the old president. These things do not prove that the new laws have worked marvels in the management of insurance companies. But the law is not self-enforceable, and we must devise a plan by which the officials at the home office will observe the law, and that is what the self-inspection system of the Federal general insurance league charter of the McFadden bill is designed to do, as anyone will observe from a careful study of that plan.

SELF-INSPECTION PLAN OF THE M'FADDEN BILL.

The McFadden bill provides for the election annually of three public certified accountants by responsible policyholders who have no voice in the management of the league. They must have been public accountants for five years before their election. They hold office for one year each and are ineligible for reelection. Their salaries are $12,000 a year each and traveling expenses while attending to their duties. No two can be residents of the same State. The charter defines their authority and duties in the following words:

PAR. 7. (Authority of censors.) The censors shall have power and authority to supervise all elections, call confidence elections, audit the accounts, verify the statements, and inspect the books, papers, and transactions, and properties of the league, become the custodians of one of the keys to the securities vault, and approve each by-law, contract, and agreement in which a director, trustee, or officer making the same is to acquire a direct personal interest.

The proper place to inspect a life insurance company is at the home office by an expert possessing the power and authority to visit all board meetings. The scandals in the management of the life insurance companies result from the officers speculating with the securities of their companies. For instance, when George W. Perkins became a partner of the promoting firm of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., we find him, as chairman of the finance committee of the New York Life, investing its insurance companies' funds in the trust certificates of the following holding companies:

Northern Securities Co	12,500,000

The Northern Securities Co. was organized in 1901 to consolidate the control of the Northern Pacific, Great Northern, and Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad companies in the hands of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., and the fact that the New York Life was carrying such securities on its books appeared in its reports to all the insurance departments for the years of 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1905 without a criticism from any of the insurance departments until the Armstrong investigating committee exposed the same in the fall of 1905. It was in August, 1902, that J. P. Morgan & Co. bought the control of the Louisville & Nashville Co. from John W. Gates, which was paid for by organizing a holding company under the laws of Connecticut, the Atlantic Coast Line Co., and issuing the holding company's trust certificates and selling them to the New York Life. The fact that that company was carrying such securities appeared in the company's 1903, 1904, and 1905 reports to all the insurance departments, without a word of protest or criticism from one of those departments until the Armstrong committee exposed it. The Atlantic Coast Line holding company was given that name so as to deceive the public by having it believe its securities were those of the railroad of the same name, but one would suppose that some one of the 49 insurance departments would have discovered the deception. The silence on the part of the insurance commissioners respecting such shady deals as those mentioned shows the necessity of that provision in the McFadden bill for the inspection of the general insurance league by expert professional censors, by men who realize the purport of such deals and who have professional reputations to be blasted by remaining silent on such occasions.

Mankind was made selfish for a purpose, for his self-preservation. It is perfectly natural for one lawyer to go into court and riddle the pleadings of his professional rival, for by doing so he not only wins his fee but he enhances his own professional reputation, and indirectly injures the professional reputation of his rival, and the lawyer who meets with many defeats loses his clientele, the influence of those who sustain him. The same thing is true respecting the professional expert accountant. Those provisions in the bill which require that a censor shall serve but a year and be ineligible for reelection is to give full scope to that trait in human nature which means so much for the preservation of civilization, for each will know that in four months a professional rival is to come in office, and that it will be to the advancement of that rival's professional reputation for him to expose wrongdoing which others in the same profession failed to expose. It is by the use of professional censors, self-selected, that the British insurance companies are so free from such scandals as disgrace us periodically. It is by the constant criticisms of those institutions by professional experts who are selfishly interested in giving publicity to the errors they discover that they are free from public scandal, and therefore enjoy such freedom in the exercise of the powers given them by the British Parliament. A high official of one of the British insurance companies said to an American in 1905, during the Armstrong investigation:

I can not for the life of me understand how you great money-making Americans have the confidence you do in your life insurance management. Your companies are never criticized until some scandal is unearthed, which upsets the business of the whole world. We are criticized every year, as it is impossible for us to go a year without making a mistake; and it is to the selfish interest of the public certified accountants who inspect us to give publicity to our errors, for fear of being exposed themselves the following year by other public certified accountants who inspect us. And we are bound to publish their criticisms, as the advertisement we thus give them is a part of the consideration for which they serve us. Our Government does not spend a penny to inspect us, and in order to inspire the confidence of the public whose business we seek we must employ these public certified accountants who enjoy high reputations in public estimation.

The American in question asked the British insurance official if he would let him see some of the reports of those censors, and the official turned to his secretary and ordered him to get the last 10 annual reports. The American said he read those reports with considerable interest, and while each contained a criticism, but one amounted to anything. That one raised the question of ultra vires—that is, it raised the question of the company's corporate right to do a certain thing it had done. But he said there was not a thing contained in any of those 10 annual reports of the censors which smacks of corruption or wrongdoing. No one can answer the criticism of that British insurance official of our paternalistic insurance-inspection system.

The press at the present time is full of the "Nicky" Arnstein scandal, wherein he is supposed to have gotten possession of $5,000,000 of Liberty bonds. That shows the carelessness of the big New York corporations in the handling of their securities. That could not have happened under the safeguards of the McFadden bill, which provides that the censors shall become the custodians of one of the keys to the securities vault. Those censors will see to it that the securities leave the vault for a proper purpose and in proper custody, as they would have to answer for any loss of the same if such loss resulted from improper safeguards. There are many other excellent safeguards provided in this Federal insurance charter, but the one I have discussed will do more to reform the insurance business in this country than all the laws on our statute books at the present time. Let Congress do its duty in providing proper safeguards for this one company, and public sentiment will force all the companies to make better safeguards for the protection of their trust funds. Such shady deals as I have mentioned will be things of the past.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, May 19, 1920.

On the conference report upon the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill, Mr. KAHN moved that the managers on the part of the House be instructed to agree in conference in substance to certain provisions as amendments to the Senate amendment, embracing sections 59 to 69 of the Senate amendment, both inclusive, providing, among other things, for the optional adoption by the States of a plan for the reorganization of the National Guard under the Army clause of the Constitution.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, much as I would like to align myself with my colleagues from the State of New York upon this proposition, I do not feel that I can conscientiously support the committee's substitute. For that matter, I am not in sympathy with many features of this bill. Under the guise of reorganization of the Army, it contains many departures from our national policy which I believe to be destructive of American traditions. The House bill was bad enough, but the Senate substitute has accentuated, if anything, its most vicious features. The unfortunate thing about the whole matter is that we, the majority of this body, are practically helpless and unable to pass upon any matters except those which our Committee on Military Affairs sees fit to present for our consideration. Notwithstanding that the House bill, consisting of about 70 pages, has been utterly wiped out and a new bill written, consisting of 165 pages, containing many new features which the House has never considered or passed upon, we are obliged to be content, under the rules governing this body, with the compromises and negotiations in conference of our four managers. This is clearly a gross abuse of legislative rules which cries aloud for reformation. The managers on the part of the House have undertaken to speak for us and have apparently assented to the wholesale amendments of the Senate and now deign to consult us only upon one phase of the measure. They have usurped the authority to legislate. New matter is contained in this bill of the gravest import to the entire country, and yet there is no suggestion that the House ought to be consulted or called upon to advise.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

For instance, on page 155 of the bill, section 69, we find a provision to the effect that "whenever Congress shall declare and the President shall proclaim that a national emergency exists," not only the National Guard and the organized Reserves of the Army of the United States shall be subject to call for immediate active military service, but "all other male citizens of the United States between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive," shall be subject to call for immediate military or naval service, as may be provided by regulation. The object of this, of course, is to forestall argument as to the draft age and practically put a permanent draft law upon our statute books.

WHAT WE ARE PERMITTED TO CONSIDER.

We are asked in the motion by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to assent to the proposal of the Senate to Federalize the National Guard and the pill is sugar-coated with the suggestion that the matter of Federalization of the guard be made optional with the respective States. This, in my opinion, does not lessen the objectionableness of the innovation. It has been well argued here that to leave the matter optional with the States would be followed by disorder, leading to confusion, jealousy, and discrimination. The States which accepted the Federalization plan would be the favored children of the War Department, while those which hung back and resisted Federalization would be handicapped and discriminated against.

If Federalization of the National Guard is good, it ought to be adopted. If it is essentially bad, as I hope to show it is, it ought to be rejected. It is no mitigation of a thing inherently bad to allow freedom of will to embrace or reject it. I contend that the temptation should not be offered.

WHAT IS FEDERALIZATION?

Let us inquire as to the meaning of Federalization of the National Guard. As tersely expressed by its sponsors, it means the reorganization of the militia of the various States under the so-called Army clause of the Constitution. Now, what is the Army clause of the Constitution? It is to be found in Article I, section 8, subdivision 12, and provides as follows:

The Congress of the United States shall have power to raise and support armies, etc.

This is the clause under which they want to reorganize the militia. In other words, we are asked to ignore that provision of the Constitution—Article I, section 8, subdivision 16—which provides specifically as follows:

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

To the gentlemen who are so anxious to enlarge the Army and to extend the authority of the Regular Establishment over the man power of the Nation, this modest clause, intended by the founders of our Government as a check and restraint upon militarism, presents a serious stumbling block to their ambition. Defeated in their efforts to enlarge the Regular Army Establishment beyond all reasonable limitations, they have cudgeled their brains and enlisted the highest legal talent in the country to evade the specific terms of the Constitution and devise a plan which will enable them to get the militia of the country under their heel. Their proposal to organize the militia of the country under the Army clause of the Constitution is a clear violation and evasion of its spirit and of the intent of its founders. To my mind it is nothing more than an indirect enlargement of the Regular Army and foreshadows the death of the militia or National Guard system. Some of the proponents of this bill chuckle with delight at the prospect and slyly hint that that denouement would be no great loss. If they were frank enough to say this outright, we would find no fault with their efforts, but they hypocritically pretend to be solicitous for the preservation of the militia system and claim to believe that a Federalized National Guard or a State National Guard may be made optional, interchangeable, and mutually harmonious.

It would be bathos to attempt to deplore the passing of the old militia system with its fuss and feathers, its gold lace, its chesty personnel of arrogant pinheads with their meticulous inspections and habitual magnification of guard mount, dress parade, and scrupulous and exacting alignments; but I would be more convinced of the sincerity of the reformation if some of those who have been conspicuous in the past as glittering examples of these defects were not so insistent for the new order. The faults of the militia system in the past have been the faults of men and methods and not of the system itself. Yet there are some men so sensitive that they are ashamed of the term "militia," forgetting that it is one of the most honorable titles evolved out of our history. To ignore that title we must first forget the men "who fired the shot heard 'round the world" and the memory of Lexington and Concord, Ticonderoga, Saratoga, and Yorktown must fade out of mind.

The founders of our Republic in framing the militia clause of the Constitution established a mechanism which is admirably adapted to meet every possible change in our national requirements. The best proof of that, in my opinion, is the national defense act, and we can not do better than to mold all necessary changes in our law upon the model which was then set.

In the memorandum accompanying the Senate amendment, printed on page 7263 of the RECORD of yesterday, we find this frank and somewhat brazen initial statement:

> The object of the National Guard provisions in the Senate bill is to make the National Guard a part of the Army of the United States.

What more need be said? If there are any here who like that sort of thing, why, then, that is the sort of thing they ought to have, but I venture to say the vast body of the citizenship of this country will look upon such a proposition as a dangerous innovation aiming directly at the heart of democratic government. A perusal of the document that I have just mentioned will furnish genuine amusement to and provoke astonishment in the mind of anyone familiar with American history. For instance, the writer says that in its present constitutional status the National Guard can be used only to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and to repel invasions. "It can not," he says, "be used for general military purposes, and therefore can not be included as such in general plans for the national defense." It seems to me it was used very effectively in the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection, and no one who is not a deadly enemy of the National Guard system would dare avow that it did not make good in the recent World War.

Next, our anonymous friend from unknown seclusion, to defend this new proposal, says that the National Guard "can not be given the uniform training required in an efficient national military force, because under the Constitution the authority to train it is expressly reserved to the several States." But I say to him that that very clause of the Constitution provides that the training of the militia must be "according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Therefore all that we need do is to prescribe the training and the National Guard organizations of the various States must comply with our directions.

It would be futile to go through the list of misstatements in this so-called defense of the Federalization plan. It is so full of errors that the puncturing of this final misstatement ought to suffice to show the flimsy foundation upon which this proposed change in our military traditions is founded. He states that the National Guard "can not be used for general military purposes as such, but must be reorganized in a new constitutional status before it can be employed as a war force." If this objection amounted to anything, it would truly be alarming. But the only obstacle seems to be in the big words used. The new constitutional status is so little different from the old that not even a new oath is required. It simply means the issuance of a proclamation by the President to the effect that the National Guards of the respective States are hereby called forth to execute the laws of the Union.

The Regular Army Establishment who are so set on this innovation flatter the vanity of the National Guardsmen by pretending to highly value the military capacity of the National Guard. Well, hardly. They are not so much attached to the National Guard as they are to get hold of the masses of men in the National Guard which this proposal will put at their command with its inevitable and pleasing prospect of promotion, power, and aggrandizement.

The friends of this measure urge that if Federalization is adopted it will put an end to the invidious discrimination against the National Guard officers which was exhibited by the Regular Establishment in the World War. Perhaps it will and perhaps it will not; but one thing is certain, and that is that there will be very few National Guard officers who will ever rise to positions of high command. It will be all right for those who are already in and have their rank; but for the young, struggling subaltern with high ambitions, I can only predict for him a most dismal and unprofitable future.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. MASON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 25, 1920.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President sent a message asking the Congress to give him the power to accept and enforce a mandate in the new Republic of Armenia. I am opposed to this most extraordinary granting of war power to the President. While I would favor a recognition of the new Republic, if he would follow the policy of this Government from the days of Washington to Roosevelt—if we could have recognition without intervention. This, however, is a plain request to give him the power to accept the mandate to establish the boundaries, when, we are informed, there is a state of war existing between Russia and Armenia on one side and Turkey and Armenia on the other side of the country. For years we have heard the Macedonian cry, and every lover of civil and religious liberty has been hoping for the day of peace in Armenia. The natural feeling of every American is to help the down-trodden people who are seeking self-government, but as the policy has been to recognize without war and as the proposition now made by the President of the United States involves us in war in the very beginning, it is most important that the law-making power should know the probable cost in life and treasure if we undertook placing into the hands of the Executive this power to commit acts of war against nations with which we are now at peace.

I have therefore introduced and sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs the following resolution:

> Whereas the President of the United States is asking for power to assume a mandate in Armenia; and
> Whereas the Congress of the United States has no official information as to the cost in American life and American Treasury; and
> Whereas it is most important that the Congress should know before adding to the burden of the over-taxed people: Therefore be it.
> Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if it be not inconsistant with public good, to state through the Departments of War, Navy, and Treasury—
> First. What boundaries are in dispute between the Russian Government and the Armenian Government.
> Second. What boundaries are in dispute between Armenia and Turkey.
> Third. How many officers and men will it take to negotiate the process of mandate.
> Fourth. How are such military forces to be divided as among infantry, artillery, and cavalry.
> Fifth. What means of transportation are at hand for conveying our troops to Armenia, what will be the expense of transportation, and whether or not the President has an agreement with the other nations of the world that lie between the United States and Armenia as to transportation of our troops through any such country.
> Sixth. What is the estimate of the number of men necessary in case he enters into war with Turkey.
> Seventh. What is the estimate of the number of men required if he enters into war with Russia.
> Eighth. What is the estimate number of officers and men in case the United States becomes involved in war with both Russia and Turkey.
> Ninth. Is it intended that the American Navy shall take part in sustaining our mandate over Armenia.
> Tenth. If so where is the nearest point that our Navy can reach the territory of Armenia and how many of the American warships will be necessary, in the opinion of the Executive, to use in this mandate, and how many seamen and marines, in the opinion of the President, will be necessary to accomplish the mandate.
> Eleventh. Does the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy intend to use the American soldiers for laborers as he did in northern Russia and Siberia, or does he intend to use them as policemen, guard the street corners, as he is now doing in Germany.
> Twelfth. If it be not inconsistent with public good, to let the Congress know if he has made an endeavor to exchange mandates with Great Britain to the end that the United States could have a mandate for oil fields of Persia and allow Great Britain the honor to the mandate in Armenia.
> Thirteenth. Also, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is to state whether he intends to take the soldiers and marines now in the regular service or call for volunteers, or whether he intends to exercise his right of conscription to the end that the American youth may be conscripted under emergencies which are likely to be, in the forceful establishment of the American mandate in Armenia.
> Fourteenth. What arrangements, if any has been made, for the return of our soldier dead who may lose their lives in Armenia.
> Fifteenth. Also please state whether, if granted power by Congress to establish a mandate for Armenia, he will in his civil and military action be governed by the so-called covenant for a League of Nations, which he agreed to, and which has been rejected by the Senate of the United States, or will he be governed by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, some questions that I have asked in this resolution may seem frivolous, but I am asking them in good faith, for in my opinion this attempt of the President is a departure from the time-honored policy of our Government as one of the most astounding and dangerous things ever attempted. To show that it is an absolute overturning of American policy let us repeat some of the statements of Presidents of the United States who have preceded President Wilson.

I insert the messages of our Presidents, beginning with Washington and ending with McKinley and Roosevelt, showing the fixed policy of our Government to keep out of European entanglements. I beg leave to quote first from John Adams's diary in 1782:

It is obvious that all the powers of Europe will be continually maneuvering with us to work us into their imaginary balances of power. They will all wish to make us a make-weight candle when they are weighing out their pounds. Indeed, it is not surprising, for we shall very often, if not always, be able to turn the scale. But I think it ought to be our rule not to meddle, and that of all the powers of Europe not to desire us, or perhaps even to permit us, to interfere if they can help us. The public negotiations and secret intrigues of the English and the French have been employed for centuries in every court and country of Europe. Look back to the history of Spain, Holland, Germany, Russia, Sweden, Denmark, Prussia, Italy, and Turkey for the last hundred years. How many revolutions have been caused? How many emperors and kings have fallen victims to the alternate triumphs of parties excited by Englishmen or Frenchmen? And can we expect to escape the vigilant attention of politicians so experienced, so keen sighted, and so rich? If we convince them that our attachment to neutrality is unchangeable, they will let us alone, but as long as a hope remains in either power of seducing us to engage in war on his side and against his enemy we shall be torn and convinced by his maneuvers.

I also quote from Washington's Farewell Address, 1796:

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Just a few words from Mr. Jefferson to the President in 1823:

I have ever deemed it fundamental for the United States never to take an active part in the quarrels of Europe. Their political interests are entirely distinct from ours. Their mutual jealousies, their balance of power, their complicated alliances, their forms and principles of government are all foreign to us. They are nations of eternal war. All their energies are expended in the destruction of the labor, property, and lives of their people. On our part never had a people so favorable a chance of trying the opposite system of peace and fraternity with mankind and the direction of all our means and faculties to the purposes of improvement instead of destruction.

One word from Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe in 1823:

A participation in (a congress proposed by Mr. Canning for the settlement of the difficulties between Spain and her colonies) would not be likely to make converts to our principles, whilst our admission under the wing of England would take from our consequence what it would add to hers. Such an invitation, nevertheless, will be a mark of respect not without a value, and this will be more enhanced by a polite refusal than by an acceptance, not to mention that an acceptance would be a step leading us into a wildness of politics and a den of conspirators.

And a few words from President Monroe in 1824:

Separated as we are from Europe by the great Atlantic Ocean, we can have no concern in the wars of the European Governments, nor in the causes which produce them.

President John Quincy Adams, in 1826, said:

Compare our situation and the circumstances of that time (that of Washington's Farewell Address) with those of the present day, and what from the very words of Washington then would be his counsels to his countrymen now? Europe has still her set of primary interests, with which we have little or a remote relation. Our distant and detached situation with reference to Europe remains the same.

Mr. Van Buren, Secretary of State, to Mr. Moore, minister to Colombia in 1829:

It is the ancient and well-settled policy of this Government not to interfere with the internal concerns of any foreign country.

A word from Daniel Webster, Secretary of State in 1842:

And the perfecting of this system of communication among nations requires the strictest application of the doctrine of nonintervention.

President Fillmore claimed that in this doctrine of "neutrality and nonintervention the United States have not followed the lead of other civilized nations, but that they have taken the lead themselves and have been followed by others."

I refer you also to Secretary of State Cass, who in 1859 declined to interfere in Mexico, although he sympathized with the constitutional party.

I will not quote further, but recommend to the student of this well-established policy of noninterference Moore's Digest of International Law, volume 6, which includes opinions of many of the Secretaries of State and many of the Presidents, including messages from McKinley and Roosevelt. Just one sentence from President Roosevelt's message in 1904:

Ordinarily it is very much wiser and more useful for us to concern ourselves with striving for our own moral and material betterment here at home than to concern ourselves with trying to better the conditions of things in other nations.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat it is no pleasant task to disagree with and criticize our President. It is almost childish for our Democratic friends to cry that we are glad the President is so sick. It is silly to make an appeal that he is above criticism because of his condition. Every human being is sorry for every other of his kind who is sick. Shall we therefore permit the man who in health betrayed us to submit to further betrayal because he is sick? Is he to be allowed to run a war in Armenia with our consent, as he did in Siberia without our consent? Are we to send our sons to die to assist Great Britain steal the oil wells across the line while we keep the owners from defending their own?

Are we to abandon the ancient and honored policy suggested by Madison to Monroe in 1823 to keep out of the "den of conspirators"? Are we to permit a sick man to play a game involving the lives of our sons when he failed in that game when he was well?

Are we to ratify a covenant in part which has been repudiated by our country? This move of the President is to play upon the feelings of our Christian liberty-loving people, a hypocritical attempt to bewilder the people, to sacrifice our children on bloody fields to gratify the whims of a man who never had and has not now any ideal he would not sacrifice for his own political ambition.

Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose this or any other measure that gives any additional power to Woodrow Wilson. I shall go back to my constituents in Illinois and answer to them that I preferred the advice of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Van Buren, Grover Cleveland, McKinley, and Roosevelt rather than that of Woodrow Wilson. If I have erred, it will not be because I have been unfaithful to the teaching of the fathers.

America Must Increase Her Farm Products.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM D. McKEOWN,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, May 26, 1920.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, the shortage of the world's supply of food and clothing is causing great distress and abnormal conditions in society and government. There are persons who bring forward many remedies to cure the world's troubles, but I am convinced that the greatest solution of all our woes is to increase the production of farm products.

This can only be done by encouraging the farmers of the country and make conditions inviting to the young men and women of the country to remain or return to the farms.

Owing to the many difficulties incident to farm life in many States the population of the rural communities decreased in the last decade and the towns and cities overflowed during the same period of time.

During the war the boys went from the farms into the Army, and many a farmer who, on account of his age, had quit hard work was forced to take the place of his son and do the hard manual labor necessary to make and gather the crop. Since the signing of the armistice he has continued to work hard for the reason that he can not get his labor, and when the boy came back home he did not remain on the farm, but went to the factory where he could get better wages than the farmer could possibly pay.

We are told that last fall, although the farmers paid as high as $3 per hundred pounds for picking cotton, pickers did not come back to the farm, and as the result much cotton was lost. The same thing is true of the wheat farmers. It is impossible under present conditions for the men who produce the food supplies and the cotton of the country to get an adequate supply of dependable labor to carry on their work, so that the farmers are either abandoning the farms or only planting just enough acreage to supply their own needs.

Some persons who do not understand the difficulties encountered in producing a crop of cotton contend here that cotton is too high, but such is not the case. When you compare the cost to produce a pound of cotton now with the cost to produce a pound of cotton before the European war, at a time when cotton was selling at 13½ cents per pound, we find that a pound of cotton should bring 48 cents to bear the same relation to the expense involved in its production.

In 1914 the cotton farmers lost so heavily that it has taken them four years to get back on their feet.

On February 9 last, speaking on this subject, among other things I said:

Mr. Chairman, it might not be out of place at this time to make a few observations relative to the conditions that now confront the American farmer. America and the entire European Continent is calling upon him for more food, and yet the conditions under which he toils do not improve. The farmers are unable to get labor at any reasonable figure and often can not employ sufficient labor at any price. This is due to the fact that during the war the call and demand for labor in the shipbuilding and manufacturing centers took from the farm all the labor that was left after the boys went to the Army. The boys have returned from the Army, but the call of the city with high wages has left but few of them on the farm.

While obtaining increased prices for his products, yet the farmer is having to pay unheard-of prices for the things he must buy. This is especially true of his farm machinery and equipment required for his business.

In 1914, when the World War broke out, the cotton farmers of my State suffered a tremendous loss because of the effect of the blockade of cotton to Germany and Austria, but, on the other hand, the things the farmers were required to buy commenced to rise in price and have been going up ever since until we are wondering where it will stop. Many farmers and merchants were ruined financially as a result of the embargo of 1914, and never recovered from the effects of the low price of cotton.

Cotton has recently reached a high price, but it has been slowly following the manufactured products up the scale. The farmers' products, as a rule, never start up at the same time as the manufactured articles, and, in my judgment, the products of the farm will be the first to be hit in the process of curtailing the cost of living, unless the farmers are aided in their methods of marketing.

Legislation that would be fair to the manufacturer in reducing the high cost of living would not be fair to the farmer.

The manufacturer can put on the market whatever quantity of the product of his factory he desires. He can increase the quantity in a given period of time or decrease the same as the exigencies may require; but the farmer can not control the amount of his crops. There is a Higher Power that controls the sunshine and the rains so necessary to a good crop. He may plant large acreage, expecting a large yield, and may have an entire failure.

It is therefore imperative that in legislating for the welfare of the farmers that we keep this fact before our minds.

Some considerable feeling has grown up in the cities against the farmers of the country on account of the enormous increase in the cost of living. This is not justified, because there is too great a difference between the prices received by the farmer and the prices paid by the consumer. The wrong lies between the two. In many places the profiteers have been taking toll. To find the profiteers seems to be a difficult job. One is reminded of that game played in the days of his youth, "Button, button, who has the button?"

One thing is certain, however, and that is, these pirates will not get their just dues until they are brought to justice and have to wear trousers with large stripes running around instead of narrow stripes running up and down.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of putting into effect every sane method that will reduce the cost of living, but I am not in favor of 5-cent cotton and 50-cent wheat to get it.

There is an abnormal demand for food, clothing, and the necessaries of life throughout the entire world. It could not be otherwise when we contemplate the immense loss and destruction of supplies during the war and the employment of millions of men in destroying lives and property for four long years. The demand grows greater every day upon the United States, and far exceeds the financial ability of many of the countries, and unless the peoples of continental Europe can get started to creating something with which to trade, the shipment of the products of the farmer will be greatly curtailed and a break in prices will result. This must be avoided.

The question of the high cost of living, which seems to mount higher at the mention of the words, can not be solved by mere legislative enactment.

There must be an increase in the supply of necessities and an abolition of obstructions in the distribution of necessaries. The Government should lend every assistance possible to this end, and the people should be informed as to the true situation. The laws of economics and statutory enactment will not change the dire effect of extravagance.

The wage earner and the salaried person are hardest hit by the mounting prices, and as fast as wages are increased the cost of living goes on up. The matter has gotten into a vicious circle and it is a perplexing problem to solve. Unless conditions improve it will be necessary for the Government to require all exporters of necessaries to show that there is sufficient supply of same before any necessaries can be exported from the United States.

It is being strenuously advocated by some that the cause of high prices is wholly due to an expanded currency. And to listen to them talk you would think that a panic would be a blessing instead of a disaster. For my part, I want the country to readjust itself to normal conditions without any jolts.

There is no doubt that the purchasing power of the dollar is affected by the present expansion of the currency, but to plunge the country into a panic by a sudden contraction of the currency would be to play the part of Samson and pull down upon ourselves our currency structure.

Profiteers operating in the large centers where the opportunities are easy to hoard large quantities of necessities have greatly augmented prices. I favor less investigations and more prosecutions. The evidence of the methods of operation make every honest man indignant and adds to the unrest throughout the country. One case that I call to mind was that of a wealthy baker who filched 1 ounce off of each loaf of bread he made during the war. Even Dives fed the crumbs off of his table to the poor, but this man stole the crumbs from the poor. It is to be hoped that he and all his kind will receive the punishment they justly deserve.

An effective method to stop speculating in and the hoarding of food is to refuse to loan money upon such security, and if the banks will call all such loans when due and refuse to renew loans to those who undertake to withhold necessities from the markets in order to increase the price, then large quantities of stored foods will reach the market.

The Department of Justice should press the prosecution of such speculators without quarter.

If every line of industry was meeting the demands upon it with the same energy and amount of work as are the farmers of the country, it would not be a great while until the supply of all products would be ample to meet the demands.

The farmer is struggling under great difficulties. He is working early and late and all the week. He does not have any time for vacations during crop seasons. He is setting the example of hard work and economy, and if the Nation will follow his example the time is not far distant when the Nation will be more prosperous than ever in its history.

The farmer, in return for his labor, demands a fair price for his products; sufficiently high to enable him to earn an honorable living for his family; to send his children out of the field into the schoolhouse and his wife to take care of the home; to enjoy the use of the telephone, good roads, and daily mail.

The farmer is entitled to receive enough from his crops to enable him to live comfortably in a modern house and not in a shack; to educate his children under well-trained and properly paid teachers; and to contribute to the betterment of his neighborhood.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I favor legislation that will help and not hamper the farmers in their struggles with present conditions, to the end that we may enjoy real and permanent prosperity throughout the Nation.

The Pay of a Private Soldier.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDMUND PLATT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, May 28, 1920.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion on the proposed soldiers' bonus or "adjusted compensation" the statement has been made over and over again that the soldiers were getting only a dollar a day, while men at home were making 5, 6, 8, or 10 dollars a day. Passing over the exaggeration often involved in the latter figures, was it true that the soldiers received only a dollar a day? If you are going to put the service of a soldier on a money basis and talk of "adjusted compensation," it is necessary to know what the actual pay of the soldiers was during the war. Was it merely the cash pay he received, or should his clothing and subsistence be counted? The base pay, in cash, of the average soldier in the war was $405.53, according to the War Department. That is over and above all necessary cost of living. Certainly the cost of living, which every wage earner has to pay, should be considered a part of a soldier's pay if you are going to make a comparison. I recall that I once worked a year myself, just after graduation from college, at $400, with board and lodging, as a teacher in a military school. My salary was not equal to a soldier's pay of to-day, because I had to buy clothes, but I saved $200 out of that $400. With clothing included, so that the present high prices would not be felt, any soldier without dependents can save $200 to-day, and many do.

I talked with a soldier of the late war one day not long ago who told me that he had saved over $400 in 18 months' service. He was an exceptionally thrifty fellow, no doubt, but with living expenses as they are now, or as they were during the war, it would have been impossible to save that amount in any urban neighborhood on less pay than $100 a month. In fact, many soldiers admit that soldiers' pay is equal to $100 a month, and some of the recruiting officers put it higher than that. We have testimony from former service men in the hearings of the Education Committee to the effect that the $80 a month paid them for subsistence while in vocational training was not equal to their former Army pay, and the committee reported a bill, which has been passed, raising their subsistence pay to $100 a month.

Now, in order to find out just what the pay of a private soldier in the Army was I have had some interesting correspondence with the War Department, my answers coming from Gen. George W. Burr, Director of Purchase, Storage, and Traffic. In the first place I found that the cash pay of a first-class private was $33 in this country and $36 in France, only the untrained men receiving $30. There were and are privates who receive continuation pay from reenlistments, so that some of them reach as much as $45 a month. This does not include any pay of noncommissioned officers, which runs up to $75 or $80 a month, and in the case of a few special experts somewhat higher. It is common talk in the Army that a sergeant at $75 a month, with everything in the line of living expenses found, is better off than a second lieutenant at $141 a month, and I have talked with sergeants myself who have told me that they could not afford to accept commissions.

Gen. Burr, in his first letter to me, gave the items of the average private soldier's pay, as follows:

Base pay	$405.53
Continuous-service pay	20.00
Allowance for dependents	40.92
Subsistence	216.34
Clothing and equipage	136.77
Quarters	51.53
Medical and dental supplies and equipment	27.50
Monthly average	75.05

I questioned this, as it seemed to me that the continuous-service pay was too large and the family allowance then too small. I asked if that average did not apply to the Regular Army of to-day rather than to the temporary Army during the war. I received a reply in the affirmative. Less than half of the men in the Army made allotments during the war or received allowances for dependents, but surely the average allowance must have been more than $3.41 a month. Gen. Burr then sent me the following, which differs in monthly average of pay only 19 cents:

Base pay	$405.53
Continuous-service pay	8.53
Allowance for dependents	54.62
Subsistence	216.34
Clothing and equipage	138.77
Quarters	51.53
Medical and dental supplies and equipment	27.50

Gen. Burr's letter explained his method of arriving at some of these figures, and I questioned him by telephone regarding some of them. I asked him, for instance, whether arms were included in "equipage," and he replied in the negative, and I am satisfied that the statement is substantially correct as to the pay of the average private in actual cost to the Government at wholesale rates. Nothing is included for the privilege of purchasing at commissary stores, though that privilege in the camps made the soldier's cash pay equal to a third more money, so far as it was expended in those stores. Cigarettes that were selling at 15, 18, and 20 cents to civilians were sold at the commissary stores at 8 and 10 cents and many other things in constant demand by the soldiers at proportionate reductions. However, Gen. Burr said he did not think any allowance could well be made for this privilege, as none of the articles so purchased were actually necessary. The soldiers had other privileges, such as reduced railroad fares when on leave, for which no allowance is made.

My point in presenting these figures is to base the discussion on the actual facts and to show that the difference between Army pay and the average of wages in civil life was by no means so great as is generally assumed. There were many cases of pecuniary sacrifice on the part of the boys who entered the military service during the war, but it may be doubted whether the average soldier really was any worse off financially than he would have been had there been no war, or even than he would have been had he remained at home. The number of men who worked in the shipyards or munition factories was comparatively small, and the war—through the increase in cost of living and through contributions to various war activities, which in my neighborhood were made by wage earners as well as by the well-to-do—made nearly everybody not richer but poorer. Only through added thrift and sacrifice were any considerable number of persons able to save money during the war, and their savings were represented by Liberty bonds and thrift stamps.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bonus proposition, not only because it is a serious matter to increase taxation and to promote idleness at this time, but because I believe the American soldier was as generously treated during the war as we knew how to treat him, and as patriotic citizens soldiers should not complain and should not be asking money from the Government at such a critical time as this. "Adjusted" means settled, and I do not believe we can settle or adjust the debt of gratitude the country owes the soldiers in any such petty way as proposed by the bonus bills. The ex-service men are young and strong and at work at high wages. They do not need "relief," though the bill is referred to as a "relief" measure. When they are older and do need relief, the country will stand by them, as it has the soldiers of former wars.

OF

HON. HENRY I. EMERSON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, May 27, 1920.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I desire to insert a letter written by Hon. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, to Hon. JULIUS KAHN in relation to the resolution that I introduced, which provided for the loaning of tents to cities during the summer. Upon the receipt of this letter the Military Affairs Committee failed to report out my resolution.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 21, 1920.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: In reply to your letter of April 13, 1920, wherein the views of the War Department are requested on H. J. Res. 326, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to loan tents to cities during the summer months of 1920 to relieve the housing situation, I have the honor to inform you that the War Department does not look with favor upon this resolution for the following reasons:

(a) In the event of the passage of this resolution there would be insufficient tentage available to meet the needs of all cities in the country.

(b) This would unavoidably lead to claims of discrimination by cities that could not be supplied.

(c) The War Department has suffered considerable financial loss in cases where tentage has been loaned to communities suffering from floods, tornadoes, or other calamities, the causes of these losses being unnecessary wear and tear due to inexperienced persons erecting and caring for tentage; destruction by fire; theft; unexplainable shortages and charges for handling and shipment.

(d) Tentage loaned to communities would not be available for the Army should an emergency demand its use.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The Bonus Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT C. PELL, JR.,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, May 28, 1920.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, I endeavored in vain yesterday to get before the House the side of those who are opposed to this soldiers' bonus. I endeavored to ask questions of the gentleman supporting it, but he would not yield. It seems to me an extraordinary condition. As I understand it, the rule is to be brought in to-morrow which will allow the bonus bill to come up for discussion, but without any right of amendment and without adequate discussion. In order to get the bill through by this method it is necessary that two-thirds of the Members vote for it. If it appeared before the House in the ordinary course, it would only require a plain majority. I do not understand the course which is being adopted by the Rules Committee. Presuming that they believe in this bill, presuming that it is something more than a political trick designed to affect the election this autumn, and for no other purpose, presuming that they sincerely think that there is a chance of this measure passing, why have they adopted this course? Are they afraid of numbers? Obviously not. Because if they see the slightest chance of getting two-thirds they must be unquestionably certain of a majority. Of what, then, are they afraid? Why do they deny a hearing to a respectable, intelligent, and capable part of their own party and to our leaders? I can see how such a course may be politics of a kind, but I can not see in what way it can be considered constructive statesmanship.

Remember that this bill was prepared entirely by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee. I understand that the Republicans put this bill through in that committee without adequate consultation with the Democrats. It will soon be before the House, to take or to leave without amendments. If this is to be the policy of the majority party, why not let us all go home and delegate to a dozen Members the absolute right to legislate in our names? It not only reduces the opposition to complete legislative impotence but it reduces those Members of the majority party so unfortunate as not to be among the lucky dozen to the dignity of trained dogs jumping through hoops.

OF
HON. THADDEUS H. CARAWAY, OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 29, 1920.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted I extend my remarks. I trust that it is not inopportune in the briefest way possible to refer to some of the more important legislative activities of mine since I have been a Member of Congress. I commenced my service in the House in the Sixty-third Congress, and am, therefore, now serving my fourth term. I come of a race of farmers and represent an agricultural district. My sympathies are enlisted in behalf of farmers and most of my activities have been directed along that line. Therefore I will set out first some of the measures in aid of farmers which have been the subject of my heartiest support.

AGRICULTURE.

COTTON.

Every effort that has been made since I have been a Member of Congress to prevent gambling in futures, both in corn and cotton exchanges, has received my heartiest support. I have been a member of every organization formed here to forward that class of legislation.

A resolution introduced by me to investigate the New Orleans and New York Cotton Exchanges is now pending and has been indorsed by every Member of Congress interested in that class of legislation from the cotton-growing States and by farm organizations in cotton-growing sections.

I was one of the group of Congressmen who made the fight in the fall and winter of 1917 and 1918 to break the great bear combinations in their attempt to force down the price of cotton in the United States, and who had succeeded in putting the price down $40 to $60 a bale. We finally induced the Government to aid the farmers and compel the banks to provide the means to enable the farmers to hold their cotton until ships could be provided to export it.

Millions of dollars were saved for the cotton growers of the South by this.

Congressman H. M. JACOWAY and myself, accompanied by some cotton growers from Mississippi County, defeated a policy of licensing the sellers or purchasers of cotton which the Department of Agriculture was fixing to put into force in 1918. There can be no doubt but what it would have ruined the cotton growers of the South had it been persisted in.

I made the opening speech resisting the fight led by Congressman MOORE of Pennsylvania and other Republicans from the Northern States to tax cotton in 1918. Their effort was firmly defeated.

I was first to take up the fight with the Department of Agriculture that led to the modification of the so-called zoning system, under which the cotton growers of our State were compelled to sell their cotton seed at a loss of from $20 to $40 per ton during 1917–18.

Advocated the Government gathering and publishing statistics giving the amount of cotton consumed each month by the cotton mills of the United States, the amount of cotton on hand from time to time at the mills and warehouses of the country, the amount exported each month, and the amount of old cotton left over at the end of the year. Before this much-needed information was obtained the speculators would give out false statements and misleading reports regarding the amount of cotton being consumed and exported. When certain speculators and spinning interests in the East and New England demanded that a price be fixed on cotton and two bills were introduced in the House, one to fix the price at 15 cents and the other at 20 cents, I found that the purpose of certain Members of the House who did not live in the cotton-growing States were to fix the price at not more than 20 cents per pound. I fought the proposition bitterly and assisted in its defeat, thereby saving millions of dollars to the farmers and merchants of cotton-growing States.

I have advocated cooperative demonstrations by the farmers of the South for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll worm.

On account of the menace to cotton culture in the United States arising from the existence of the pink boll worm in Mexico, the Secretary of Agriculture, in order to prevent the establishment and spread of such worms in Texas and other parts of the United States, is authorized to make surveys of its actual distribution in Mexico, to establish in cooperation with the States concerned a zone or zones free from cotton culture on or near the border of any State or States adjacent to Mexico, and to cooperate with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities in the extermination of the local infestations near the border of the United States.

I advocated making investigations to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prevent the movement of cotton and cotton seed from Mexico into the United States, to make surveys to determine the actual distribution of the pink boll worm in Mexico, and to exterminate local infestations in Mexico near the border of the United States in cooperation with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities.

To conduct surveys or inspections in Texas or in any other State to detect any infestations and to conduct control measures, including the establishment of cotton-free areas in cooperation with the State of Texas or other States concerned, as may be necessary to eradicate such infestation.

I have assisted in investigations to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the existence of the pink cotton-boll worm in Mexico and to prevent the establishment of such insect in the United States by the employment of all means necessary.

I have advocated and assisted in the fight in the Democratic caucus which resulted in an act to require Federal reserve banks to loan money on cotton warehouse receipts.

ROADS.

I favor keeping faith with the people in the matter of good roads construction in the United States, and pledge myself to the policy of carrying on this work in each and every county in the State. I favor every county sharing in these appropriations and having a fair deal. I have the friendship and confidence of the various departments of the Federal Government that have to do in various ways with the question of road building, and it is my desire and purpose to see that justice is done to all the counties in the State.

I assisted in the passage of the good-roads act, which appropriated millions of dollars for building roads by cooperation between county, State, and Federal Government, these roads to lead from the farms to the towns and cities.

I have advocated investigations of the best methods of road making, especially ordinary sand-clay and dirt roads, and the best kind of road-making material, and for furnishing expert advice on road building and maintenance.

RURAL CREDITS.

The first rural-credit bill ever seriously considered by Congress was one introduced by me. It was adopted in the Committee of the Whole, but afterwards defeated by a teller vote.

Twelve of the fundamental provisions in the present farmers' loan law were first contained in the bill I introduced. Among these was one to allow farmers a loan upon the value of improvements. This bill, as introduced by me, was indorsed by the National Farmers' Union, the National Grange, and the Society of Equity, all farmers' organizations composed exclusively of farmers.

I am the author of the amendment to the farm-loan act under which the borrowing of money on lands for speculative purposes is prohibited. I wanted the law to aid those who wanted homes, not to accumulate large estates to be held for speculation.

I voted for and helped to pass the Federal reserve banking act, which took away from Wall Street the power to produce a panic.

RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

The flood control bill to protect the valleys of the lower Mississippi River was the most important flood-protection measure ever before Congress.

When this bill was to be considered in the House the Congressmen vitally interested in its passage asked the Speaker to appoint me chairman of the Committee of the Whole House when this measure was to be considered. I was so appointed and did preside. Permit me to say that rulings made by me during its consideration and sustained by the committee did much to preserve that bill in its present helpful form.

I introduced the bill under which the St. Francis and Black Rivers and their valleys are now being surveyed and complete plans and estimates of cost for the protection from floods of the valleys of these rivers will be made, with a final view of getting Government aid for these improvements.

A bill introduced by me is now a law under which Government lands in improvement districts can be taxed as other lands to help pay for drainage.

The bill under which certain lands along the St. Francis River, when reclaimed, are to be sold and the proceeds used in defraying the expenses of draining the St. Francis delta was introduced by me.

ANIMAL HUSBANDRY.

I secured the establishment of a beef experiment station at one of the agricultural schools in Arkansas, where experiments are now carried on in breeding, feeding, and shipping beef cattle.

I advocated the carrying out of the provisions of an act establishing a bureau of animal industry to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and disseminate information concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products.

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry.

For investigating diseases of animals, for their control and eradication, methods of treatment and prevention, independently or in cooperation with farmers' associations, State or county authorities.

For experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with State agricultural experiment stations.

For investigating the disease of hog cholera and its control and eradication.

For investigating the preparation for market, handling, grading, packing, freezing, drying, storing, transportation, and preservation of poultry and eggs.

For furnishing to producers, dealers, newspapers, and consumers accurate information regarding supplies of fruits, vegetables, dairy and poultry products.

For collecting and distributing by telegraph, mail, or otherwise, timely information on the supply, demand, commercial movement, disposition, quality, and market prices of dairy and poultry products.

Provided for publication and distribution of bulletins on hog and cattle raising in the South.

GENERAL AGRICULTURAL IMPROVEMENTS.

I assisted in having withdrawn from the forest area and opened for homestead entry nearly 1,000,000 acres in Arkansas. There are now many prosperous farmers owning their own homes within this area.

I introduced a bill, and had it considered by the Committee on Public Lands, where it is now pending, to grant to the agricultural schools, and to the colleges of agriculture of our State, one-half of the funds arising from the sale of timber from forest reserves within the State. This bill received the indorsement of the Farmers' Union of Arkansas.

Helped to pass the Smith-Lever agricultural extension act, which gathers, publishes, and distributes throughout America the best thoughts and methods of touching the various phases of profitable, up-to-date farming and scientific agriculture, and it is the most valuable and comprehensive farm demonstration plan ever devised.

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the several States in the employment of agents to acquire and diffuse useful information connected with the distribution and marketing of farm products.

Advocated the investigation of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from the tropical regions and for the improvement of cotton.

I helped to pass a law taking tax off of bagging and ties and agricultural implements.

Helped to establish the Bureau of Markets, giving the needed and valuable assistance and information to both producer and consumer.

For collecting and distributing by telegraph, mail, or otherwise, timely information on the supply, commercial movement, disposition, and market prices of fruits and vegetables.

Have advocated the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops.

Investigation of insects affecting cereal and forage crops.

Investigation of and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production and the study of cereal diseases.

Have advocated investigating means and methods of more effectually providing for the national security and defense by gathering authoritative information concerning the food supply, by increasing production, and preventing waste of food supplies.

Have advocated investigating the history and habits of the insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, the study of insects affecting the health of man and domestic animals, and ascertaining the best means of destroying those found to be injurious.

Have advocated the investigation of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, and sugar cane.

Have advocated investigating and reporting farm drainage, and for the drainage of swamp and other wet lands which may be made available for agricultural purposes.

For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production.

For investigating the food habits of North American birds in relation to agriculture.

For investigating plant diseases, soil bacteriology, and plant nutrition.

For the investigation of insects affecting fruits, orchards, vineyards, and nuts.

For the investigation and improvement of fruits and the methods of fruit growing, harvesting, and in cooperating with the Bureau of Markets, studying the behavior of fruits during the processes of marketing and while in commercial storage.

I have given special thought and study and rendered valuable service to the great agricultural interests in my State and Nation.

I was one among the 20 Members of Congress who voted against the so-called daylight-saving bill, and also assisted in its repeal.

PROHIBITION.

I supported the national prohibition amendment.

I had stricken from the bill for the enforcement of this amendment the provision authorizing the opening of private letters.

Prohibition has become a national policy. I am not a fanatic on this subject, but I do believe a nation sober is better than a nation drunk.

SUFFRAGE.

I voted for the Federal amendment granting suffrage to women, and since its adoption, at the request of advocates of this amendment, have aided in several States to secure its ratification.

GENERAL LEGISLATION.

The amendment adopted to the railroad-control bill, under which were preserved the police powers to the State, was prepared and offered by me. Without this amendment all the laws of the several States protecting both employees and passengers on railroad trains would have been nullified, such as the separate-coach law, assigning separate coaches for whites and negroes. Without it negroes would have been privileged to occupy any coach, including sleeping and dining cars, on any train.

I advocated and reported a bill to prohibit the intermarriage of negroes and whites within the District of Columbia and all Territories under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

So far as I know, I was the first Member of Congress to advocate the enactment of a law to prevent the enlistment of negroes in the Army and Navy in time of peace, or their appointment as cadets in either West Point or Annapolis.

I advocated and assisted in bringing about the separation of the races in the Government departments in Washington, placing whites in one room and negroes in another.

I advocated, and had reported and made the report from the Committee on the District of Columbia, a bill for separate coaches and conveyances for negroes and whites in the District of Columbia.

A committee, of which I was a member, prepared and had passed a bill known as the soldiers and sailors' civil-rights bill to protect the family and estates of soldiers and sailors of this Great War.

I helped to pass the law which provided for a fleet of merchant ships to carry the products of our farms and factories to the markets of the world.

I was a member of the committee that drafted the espionage act, and I assisted in having stricken from that bill, as first proposed, the right to search private residences without a warrant. I now stand for a repeal of this measure.

I was one among the first to advocate sending out of this country those who advocate the overthrow of our Government by force, and helped to secure legislation to carry out this purpose. Under this law the deadly enemies of our country are being sent back to their own country.

I have always voted for restricted immigration laws, which are intended to protect America from the unfit people and criminal refuse of foreign countries.

I advocated and will continue to advocate fair and just treatment of American soldiers who served our country in the great World War. I have voted for measures that promote and safeguard their interest in various ways, and can be counted on to do the very best that can be done for them in the final settlement for which they are now asking. Various plans have been suggested and various measures on this subject are now before the Ways and Means Committee. The soldiers themselves are divided in opinion as to just what they desire to be done, but I believe that Congress will pass a just and satisfactory measure, and I stand ready to vote for such a measure.

I have opposed in every way measures that seek to foist upon America any plan or system that smacks of military despotism.

I helped pass the workmen's compensation act for accidents and death in industry.

I helped to pass the humane act declaring that human labor is not a commodity, thus taking the flesh and blood of human beings out of the class of chattels.

I helped pass the child labor act, which took thousands of children out of the sweatshops and factories of the country. This law freed children from conditions that were depriving them of an education and sapping their vitality and dwarfing their young bodies.

In the matter of differences or disputes arising between railroad employer and employee, I favor absolute justice to both in the matter of protecting and safeguarding the right of both, keeping in mind and safeguarding at all times the rights and interests of the public.

I fought centralization of Government and never lost an opportunity to defend the doctrine of State rights.

Have supported every measure necessary to carry out the purpose of the people in constitutional amendments adopted.

I favor readjustment of the income tax so that the single man shall have an exemption of an income of $2,000 and the man with a family $5,000.

I supported every measure looking to the best interests and advancement of the cause of education.

I favor speedy action on the peace treaty and urge the repeal of all special laws growing out of the war that restrain and harass the citizens of the United States in the free and honest management of their own private affairs.

Have advocated in the House and elsewhere the doctrine that America and other civilized nations should set up an international tribunal for the settlement of disputes by arbitration, to the end that peace of the world may be preserved and the cruel, useless slaughter of human beings prevented.

I introduced an amendment to the bill requiring the Government to educate and rehabilitate disabled soldiers and sailors of the World War. Without this it would have been impossible for the soldiers and the sailors to secure education other than that which would fit them to enter some trade. Now they may take literary training or study for any of the professions.

I introduced the bill requiring Federal judges in cases triable by jury to follow the procedure and practice of the State courts, and forbidding them to express an opinion as to the credibility of a witness or the weight of the testimony. This bill is now pending in the Senate. It passed the House without a dissenting vote.

I reported and secured the passage of a measure to reduce the cost of writs of error and appeals in Federal courts.

Voted for Federal aid for State schools and colleges for vocational education.

Advocated and voted for the measure to increase the pay of school-teachers in the District of Columbia.

RECONSTRUCTION LEGISLATION.

I favor the immediate closing of the war by treaty stipulation, preserving America's rights, and securing a lasting peace.

I am in favor of repealing the irksome war laws that have outlived their usefulness.

I stand pledged to favor soldier legislation along the lines recommended by the American Legion. I will not deny to these soldiers relief after they have so valiantly performed the duties demanded of them by America.

Modifications and changes in the present tax law are necessary. The burden should be distributed so that those most able to pay shall pay the greater share.

I stand pledged to favor Federal aid to good roads and the expenditure of large sums to enable us to repopulate the farms and thereby lower the cost of living.

I am in favor of adequate and additional marketing facilities so the farmer will not have to market his crops at a sacrifice.

I favor stamping out gambling in farm products so the farmer can have an open and honest market in which to sell the products of the farm, thereby reaping the benefit of his own toil and industry.

I have been true to the farmer and his legislation at every step of the way. The speeches made, bills introduced, votes cast in his behalf are all available. The record is made. I stand on it. I will continue to do what I can to help the farmer.

I favor legislation to extend to farmers loans at a low rate of interest and for a short time, to enable them to make and harvest their crops. I want to free them from the thraldom of the credit merchant and the money lender.

I stand pledged to grant by law to labor a fair deal. It is foolish from a standpoint of economy, and wrong from a standpoint of morals, to deprive labor of a full share in the wealth it produces. Justice and fair dealing must characterize future legislation.

I favor equal suffrage for both men and women. They both pay taxes; they both serve the Nation in times of peace and war.

I am not in favor of reducing the volume of money and bringing on another panic for the benefit of the financiers, who alone would profit, to the grief and distress of the rest of us. To do this would ruin the man in debt, but multiply the millions of the money lenders.

I oppose universal military training, call it compulsory or volunteer. I do not want to see America chained hand and foot to the chariot of militarism.

I have no divided allegiance. I have always stood before, during, and since the war for America and American rights and institutions.

I stand pledged for rigid economy in Government expenditures. The Government should be conducted on a business and not a political basis.

In conclusion, permit me to say I am willing to stand on my record, the speeches made, bills introduced, votes cast, and the life I have lived, the things I have achieved, the loyalty displayed, both in times of peace and war—the record as it stands. On this I stand and am willing to be judged.

OF

HON. CHAS. POPE CALDWELL,

OF NEW YORK.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I print the speech I had prepared to deliver at Jamaica, Long Island, as a part of the memorial exercises to-day and which I have asked Hon. Edward J. Kiely, sr., to read there in my behalf, it having become necessary for me to stay in Washington and attend the day's session of the House:

"Mr. Chairman, veterans of America's wars, ladies, and gentlemen, to-day the patriotic sons and daughters of our new nationalism pay tribute to the heroic dead whose sacrifice has made America possible, preserved the Union of the States, defended the cause of humanity, and protected our rights. Thus we honor them, for selfishness has never caused the American sword to leave its scabbard, and our greatest profit has been the satisfaction which comes from a wrong made right.

"This is not a day of celebration. It is for hero worship, unstinted and unashamed. We march, not to show a martial spirit but as a token that we hope to meet at the end of life's journey the great souls who have gone on before, that we might tarry yet a little while and enjoy the liberty of this life that was purchased with theirs and at that meeting give an account of the way we have used that liberty and preserved it for our children and our children's children.

"Out of courtesy these exercises are primarily under the auspices of the Grand Army of the Republic and United Spanish War Veterans. Each has had its appropriate part in the program. With high veneration and deep regard for the prowess of the veterans of those wars, the new generation bows in humble recognition of their mighty sacrifice and pays tribute to their heroic dead. But as the man really learns to value his father only when he contemplates his own child, it would not be amiss on this day of hero worship if we fill our minds with the contemplation of the heroism of this generation, the children of the veterans of the other wars, and thus learn how to appreciate those whose ranks are thinning, for

"There is a reaper whose name is death,
And with his sickle keen,
He reaps the bearded grain at a breath
And the flowers that grow between.

"The object of all life is the propagation of its species and the betterment of the conditions under which its offspring is to live. As the tree sheds its leaves, fertilizing the soil, and at last the dead trunk of the parent oak moulders in the ground a young oak springs up in its place, growing to greater heights and of finer fiber, so man in his struggle to better conditions of his offspring sets up government which sheds the leaves of its manhood to make better the condition under which it flourished. Wars are fought and governments decay. From their crumbling ruins new nations spring of a higher type and with a finer sense of justice.

"In America every generation has had its war, and as one generation of heroes passes away another rises to take its place. They go but are not forgotten, for their deeds are the basis of the tradition around which our nationalism is built and their sacrifice and success the incentive to noble deeds by those that follow.

"I say each new generation in the march of time has its war, and as the veterans of one war pass on to their final roll call, a new army marches on to take their places among the living, to receive the adulation of their generation, and to watch with patience and forbearance the manner in which the children of the new day care for the heritage that has been made possible by their heroism. To-day we have the veterans of three wars doing honor to their comrades and the heroes of our wars.

"That which we love above all save God and His righteousness—that which we call the Government of the United States—secured its life by war, and the price paid in blood and treasure was small if the heritage of freedom is cherished by those for whom the sacrifice was made. In justification, the noble manhood of America has ever been willing, though never prepared, to defend our country, its principles and rights, against all enemies, foreign and domestic, in the same spirit.

"Life crowds to-morrow upon to-day with its major and insistent problems with such demand that we seldom have time to think of yesterday and draw from its experiences lessons for the future. The little child learns of our wars most from old age, for both have fewer cares and more time, the one to dig from the recesses of memory, the other to store there the treasures found.

"How pleasant it is to recount to your child or grandchild the deeds of heroism performed by your companion in arms, in later years, when the mellow of friendship has dissipated the recollections of shortcomings, and when the reason has supplied to memory the blanks lost to intelligence, with an honest conviction that things were because they ought to have been; and how fond are we to believe them when so told, even though we hesitate to repeat them for fear the sacred truth may be doubted.

"But our last war is still new in our minds. When we speak of it our exaggerations may be as great, for we tell of our boys, and the stories are lighted with pride, love, and gratitude. Because of our lack of preparation for the war, the world was prone to think of us as a nation of money lenders, and gladly perverted the statement of our President that there was such a thing as being too proud to fight without just cause to a declaration that we wouldn't fight, and from that to believe that we couldn't fight.

"For many months before we declared war we were fed up on the belief that it would take a year to raise an Army of a million men, two years to train them, and five to arm and equip them. Our greatest and wisest men honestly believed such to be the case. Two ex-Presidents and three ex-Secretaries of War so maintained, and the boasts of those who opposed preparation, that a million men would spring to arms overnight when called, was scoffed at by those who thought they knew.

"All were wrong.

"We are a moneyed people because we are intelligent, energetic, and industrious. We are slow to take up arms because a war with us is a war of the people and they know and hesitate over the sacrifice and hardship that it entails, and will not unless the cause is just and the provocation great. But we know how to fight and are not afraid. In fact, we are the most warlike people on the earth and the most desperate in battle. The standard of America has waved over our homes and on our battle fields, at home and abroad, for almost a century and a half. It has never trailed in defeat, because when America goes to war the hearts of her people go with her soldiers.

"Since Jehovah decreed that man should earn his living by the sweat of his brow, men have worked to live, and if by living we mean happiness, no man has ever lived whose work has not been in the service of others. The greater the service and the less selfishly it is given, the greater the happiness that results therefrom.

"One may grow fat and luxuriate upon the toil and service of others. He may gain great riches by chicanery, but he will not live—be happy—unless in turn he serves his fellow man. And as this is true of the individual, so it is true of the Nation. Our participation in this war was a service to humanity, and particularly to France. It was freely and unselfishly given. It made us the acknowledged foremost Nation of the world and the satisfaction we have earned by our deeds fills us with pardonable pride in our manhood and gives us an ample competence to enjoy the peace and happiness we deserve.

"France is the most sentimental nation on earth, and in her heart she cherishes a deep regard for America and a lasting gratitude for the service rendered by our soldiers. When the irritations have been forgotten, the French mothers will tell their litttle children of the great people that crossed the sea infested by the German submarines, building, as they came, a line of communication and establishing their strange machinery. How hope rose in the saddened heart of a heroic people who were all but crushed and how they rejoiced when victory was snatched from the greatest military autocracy that the world had ever seen.

"They will tell of the great size of our soldiers, of their tender care of little children and kindness to the aged and infirm. How with the one hand they supported the fallen and with the other struck the mighty blow for humanity that turned back the tide of war and liberated their beloved soil from a ruthless foe.

"They will marvel at the energy and skill with which the American Army went about its tasks, doing in eight months the work that France thought would take five years. How the great American general, after a three weeks' inspection, laid down the plans, marking the ports that were to be dug, docks to be built, railways and storage plants to be constructed, waterworks to be installed, headquarters to be established, and camps to be erected; and how, with mathematical precision, the strongest point in the German line was selected as the place to make assault, upon the understanding that a breach here was a mortal wound and would be a guaranty of early victory. Then, without detracting from the heroism of the French soldier or the British Tommy, they will tell how American doughboys romped over the barbed-wire entanglements, jumped the German trenches, stormed the pill boxes, captured the machine-gun nests, and routed the enemy.

"Each year on this, our Memorial Day, as they are doing to-day, all of France will journey to the American cemeteries where lie the sentinels of freedom, decorate the graves of our heroic and beloved dead, and bless the Nation that came at freedom's call of anguish—came with her men and women, her money and machinery, her material and her brains, and having come, dried the tears, fed the hungry, protected the weakened, succored the injured, and freed the world.

"All of America's wars have been in the cause of humanity, and each of her victories has been the beginning of an advanced era in human government.

"Some are so critical as to say that the politicians have thrown away America's greatest world opportunity in a fight among themselves for the control of domestic affairs; some say that we have drawn back in the nick of time to preserve American institutions and retain our sovereignty and independence. I will trust the American public to make a just decision and visit its punishment where deserved.

"The world is crying for peace and America joins in the cry. Our manhood fought to protect our rights and preserve our institutions. Neither the selfish pride of authorship nor the contemptible schemes of politicians shall deny that which it so devoutly craves—peace and an opportunity to heal up its wounds and forget the hell of war. The world has learned its lesson. America must be consulted in the future, league or no league. Her demands will always be for simple and exact justice, which no self-respecting nation dare deny, but, denying, must reckon with a Navy that is second to none and a man power that is greater than any.

"Sleep on, proud heroes of this and other wars, wherever you may lie. The fight you have made has been a blessing to mankind, and Americans in America see in a new light the tower of liberty that now faintly illumines the darkest recesses of the world.

"Your lives have not been given in vain. We weep because you are our kin, but we are proud that you so nobly fought and nobly died and rejoice that you are in God's keeping."

Abraham Lincoln and Ulysses S. Grant.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,
OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege granted me by the unanimous consent of the House, I append the following address made by me at a memorial meeting in the Rotunda of the Capitol, held under the auspices of the U. S. Grant Circle and Lincoln Circle, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, District of Columbia, on Sunday, May 30, 1920, in honor of Abraham Lincoln and Ulysses S. Grant:

MEMORIAL ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE AT THE ROTUNDA OF THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, D. C., MEMORIAL SUNDAY, MAY 30, 1920, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF U. S. GRANT CIRCLE AND LINCOLN CIRCLE, LADIES OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

LINCOLN AND GRANT.

Madam President, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, comrades, and friends: To-day memorial services similar to these are being held in every city and village in the land from North to South, from East to West, and in the islands of the sea. It is fitting that we should meet in the Nation's Capitol, and in this historic Hall pay our tribute to the noble dead. In the earlier history of the Republic, in an adjoining room, the House of Representatives held its sessions, conducted its debates, and passed laws for the orderly government of the Nation. There many historic discussions took place, participated in by the great men of the past. In that room Henry Clay presided as Speaker of the House for nearly 10 years; Daniel Webster, Thomas H. Benton, and John C. Calhoun sat there as Representatives. Within 100 feet of the spot on which I now stand was the desk of John Quincy Adams, where he sat for 17 years after he had completed a term of 4 years as President of the United States, patiently performing his duties as a Representative. The spot where he fell upon this floor while in the performance of his duty is marked by a bronze plate. His body was borne to yonder room, where presently his soul took flight. There the great emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, served his single term in Congress. The statues of these great Americans and of many others have been placed in this Capitol, the scene of many of their earthly labors, as perpetual memorials to their memories.

Could any place be more appropriate than this for the sacred purpose for which we are assembled to-day—a memorial service for the dead soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and of all our wars?

I have been requested to speak particularly of the two greatest figures and heroes of the Civil War—Lincoln and Grant. The one was our great leader in statesmanship and administration; the other our great military captain who led our armies to victory in the field.

There was much in common in the early lives of Lincoln and of Grant. Both were born in lowly circumstances, and both were of families of long American lineage. Ulysses S. Grant was born April 27, 1822—98 years ago—at Point Pleasant, Ohio, in a small frame house such as succeeded the log cabin in the early days of our country. His father was a tanner.

When 17 years of age Grant was appointed a cadet at West Point by Congressman Thomas L. Hamer, of Ohio, and graduated from the Military Academy in 1843 at the age of 21 years, ranking 21 in a class of 39. Thus his standing in his class, a little below the medium, gave no indication of his future greatness as a military leader. He was commissioned as a brevet second lieutenant, and was made a full second lieutenant September 30, 1845. In March, 1846, the war with Mexico then being in progress, he proceeded with his regiment to Mexico and participated in the Battle of Palo Alto on May 8. On the following day he was made acting adjutant of his regiment in place of an officer who was killed in the Battle of Resaca de la Palma. On the 21st of September of the same year the Battle of Monterey was fought, and Grant, although then on quartermaster duty, went to the front and participated in the assault on the city. He also participated in the same month in the siege of Vera Cruz, the Battle of Cerro Gordo, the asault on Churubusco, the storming of Chapultepec, and the Battle of Melino del Rey. Col. Garland, the commander of his brigade, in his report of the storming of Chapultepec, said: "Lieut. Grant, Fourth Infantry, acquitted himself most nobly upon several occasions under my own observation." After the Battle of Melinó del Rey he was appointed on the field a first lieutenant for gallantry, and at Chapultepec later he was brevetted a captain, to date from that battle, September 13, 1847. He thus demonstrated his courage and devotion to duty, and entered the City of Mexico with the American Army on September 14, 1847.

Upon the conclusion of the Mexican War Capt. Grant's regiment was sent to the Pacific coast, where he served at Fort Vancouver, Oregon Territory, and at Humboldt Bay, in California, remaining on the coast until 1854, when he resigned from the Army, as he saw no prospect of being able to support his family on his pay. After his resignation he lived for a time in St. Louis and at Galena, Ill. His Army life had probably disqualified him for success in business, and he lived a rather precarious life during that period.

Fort Sumter, in Charleston Harbor, was fired upon by the troops under Gen. Beauregard Sunday, April 14, 1861. On the following day, Monday, the people of Galena, upon receipt of the news, held an indignation meeting, over which the humble Capt. Grant was called to preside. At the conclusion of the meeting Capt. Grant declared his intention of again entering the service of the country that had given him a military education. Gov. Richard Yates, the great war governor of Illinois, and father of a subsequent governor of the same name who now is an honored member of the House of Representatives, requested Capt. Grant to assist in the adjutant general's office of the State, and he was given charge of the mustering in of 10 regiments, his knowledge of Army methods being of great service to inexperienced officers. Later he wrote a letter to The Adjutant General, United States Army, at Washington, reciting his previous military experience and respectfully tendering service "until the close of the war, in such capacity as may be offered," adding that with his military experience he felt that he was "competent to command a regiment if the President should see fit to intrust one to him." This letter brought no reply, and Capt. Grant endeavored to see Gen. McClellan at Cincinnati, hoping that he might be offered a place on his staff. During his absence Gov. Yates appointed him colonel of the Twenty-first Illinois Infantry, and issued his commission June 15, 1861.

Events succeeded each other with great rapidity. Col. Grant's first service with his regiment was at Palmyra, Mo., where he proceeded to the relief of an Illinois regiment reported to be surrounded. Before his arrival the imperiled regiment had retreated, and he expected to give battle at the little town of Florida, in Missouri. In his memoirs Gen. Grant says that when the top of the hill was reached only a deserted camp appeared in front. "It occurred to me at once," he says, "that Harris had been as much afraid of me as I had been of him." From that event to the close of the war "I never experienced trepidation in confronting the enemy. Although I had more or less anxiety, I never forgot that he had as much reason to fear my forces as I had to fear his."

On August 7, 1861, he was appointed a brigadier general by the President, and on November 7, 1861, he fought his first real battle at Belmont, Mo., where he had a horse shot under him and had several narrow escapes. The Union losses were 485 killed, and the loss of the enemy was officially reported as 632. Early in January, 1862, Gen. Grant, whose headquarters at that time were at Cairo, Ill., went to St. Louis to explain his plans for a campaign against Forts Henry and Donelson, the first on the Tennessee River, the other on the Cumberland River, in the southern part of Kentucky. Gen. Halleck told him that his scheme was preposterous.

On February 1, however, he was instructed to go ahead, and he proceeded with a number of gunboats under Flag Officer Foote, of the Navy, and 9,000 men on transports and disembarked a few miles below Fort Henry. Immediately upon disembarkation a force of 17,000 additional men was brought in, and the attack was made on the 6th of February with complete success. Gen. Tilghman, in command, with his staff and 120 men, were captured, the remainder of the force having evacuated. Grant had no instructions to attack Fort Donelson, but moved his army over fearful roads and began investing Fort Donelson on the 12th. On the 14th the gunboats commenced the attack, and on the 15th Gen. Grant received a note from Gen. S. B. Buckner, suggesting the appointment of commissioners to agree upon terms of capitulation. To this note Gen. Grant sent the historic reply:

"No terms except an unconditional and immediate surrender can be accepted. I propose to move immediately upon your works."

This laconic message doubtless had more to do with the popularity of Gen. Grant than any other written statement made during his life. It immediately electrified the whole North, where anything of an encouraging nature had become extremely rare. Up to this time the Confederates had achieved nearly all the notable successes of the war; and the actions at Fort Henry, and particularly at Fort Donelson, were the turning points in the conduct of the war. From that time on Gen. Grant was inseparably connected with all the notable successes of the Union Army. It is not necessary on this occasion to recite Gen. Grant's many military successes. It is sufficient that in the main he was successful. It is true that he was criticized during the war and sometimes since because of his invariable insistence upon having a sufficient number of men to carry out his military plans and his policy of fighting wherever it was necessary and always to the best advantage, thus losing a great many troops. The best military opinion, however, justified his policy as being one that in the long run doubtless saved lives and brought final success to the Union arms.

He fought from time to time the battles of Shiloh, Corinth, Iuka, and Vicksburg—the latter, an almost impregnable stronghold commanding the Mississippi River, surrendering on the 4th of July, 1863. Here he declined to agree to the appointment of commissioners, and would accept no terms but unconditional surrender with humane treatment of prisoners of war. Gen. Grant was always considerate of the enemy when they were placed at a disadvantage, as was exemplified many times, and notably at the end of the war, when he received Lee's surrender. At Vicksburg the Confederates surrendered 30,000 men, besides cannon, small arms, and military stores. When the paroled prisoners were ready to march out, Gen. Grant ordered the Union soldiers "to be orderly and quiet as these prisoners pass" and "to make no offensive remarks."

This notable victory occurred simultaneously with the battle of Gettysburg, fought on the Union side by Gen. George G. Meade, with Gen. Robert E. Lee in command of the Confederates. The 4th of July, 1863, may be reckoned the turning point in the war. On March 1, 1864, Congress passed an act reestablishing the grade of lieutenant general in the Regular Army, with the view of placing Grant in complete command. He was ordered to Washington, and on this occasion he first was introduced to President Lincoln, although he had heard him make a speech many years before. He arrived very unostentatiously on March 8, and registered at the hotel simply as "U. S. Grant and son, Galena." He was received by President Lincoln on the following day. After introductions President Lincoln addressed him as follows:

"Gen. Grant, the expression of the Nation's approbation of what you have already done, and its reliance on you for what remains to be done in the existing great struggle, are now presented with this commission constituting you lieutenant general in the Army of the United States. With the high honor devolves on you an additional responsibility. As the country herein trusts you, so under God it will sustain you. I scarcely need to add that with what I here speak for the Nation goes my own hearty personal concurrence."

Gen. Grant made the following reply:

"Mr. President, I accept the commission with gratitude for the high honor conferred. With the aid of the noble armies that have fought on so many battle fields for our common country, it will be my earnest endeavor not to disappoint your expectations. I feel the full weight of the responsibilities now devolving upon me; and I know that if they are met it will be due to those armies, and above all to the favor of that Providence which leads both nations and men."

Gen. Grant had the utmost confidence in Gens. Sherman and Sheridan and never omitted an opportunity of acknowledging their great services and the assistance which they had been to him. On their part, they were always loyal in their support of the modest Gen. Grant.

Gen. Grant will, in my opinion, go down to posterity not alone because of his military successes but also because of his nobility as a man as displayed in his far-sighted and generous treatment of Gen. Lee and the armies of the South in the final capitulations; also, because of the stand which he took against the wishes of President Andrew Johnson to have Gen. Lee and other military leaders of the South tried for treason. This latter phase of Gen. Grant's character and statesmanlike attitude is deserving of a chapter all to itself. I have frequently observed in speeches made in Congress by southern men that this feature of Gen. Grant's character has apparently made a profound impression upon the South, which grows as time advances.

The final result of the negotiations between Gen. Lee and Gen. Grant at the little farmhouse at Appomattox on April 9, 1865, was contained in the following terms presented by Gen. Grant:

"The officers to give their individual paroles not to take up arms against the United States until properly exchanged, and each company or regimental commander to give a like parole for the men of his command. The officers to retain their side arms, private horses, and baggage. This done, each officer and man will be allowed to return to his home, not to be disturbed by the United States authority so long as they observe their paroles and the laws in force where they may reside."

It is to be remembered that at this time his armies were in complete command of the situation, and he might have insisted, had be been so disposed, upon any terms, however humiliating.

In a speech made by the Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, of Texas, in the House of Representatives, April 27, 1920, this distinguished southern man, son of a Confederate soldier, made the following comment:

"These terms were made with Lincoln's approval. In addition to these terms Grant instructed his commissioners designated to receive the surrender of Lee's army to permit the private soldiers to take away the horses to reestablish themselves on the farms, and directed that the hungry men being paroled should receive the rations which Lee requested for them.

"During the whole of the negotiations, those who were present tell us, and so does Gen. Grant himself, that Lee was compelled more than once to direct the attention of Gen. Grant to the business which had called them together. On that occasion this rugged man of many battles demonstrated a tender deference and a profound respect and sympathy for Gen. Lee which appeals to the gratitude and to the affectionate regard for Grant of every true southern man; and not only do I feel that gratitude as a southern man, but as a citizen of this Republic who has never felt estranged from it I realize that Gen. Grant's conduct on that occasion, and especially during the two fateful years which followed, more than anything else has made it possible for the hearts of the southern people to thrill, as now they do, with real vital love for the selfsame flag which waved in final victory that day over Appomattox's bloody fields. The facts permit not a shadow of doubt."

Subsequently President Andrew Johnson was undoubtedly pressed from many quarters to cause trials for treason to be instituted against Gen. Robert E. Lee and other Confederate generals. In the hearings before the Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives, on July 8, 1867, Gen. Grant was called as a witness, and at that time it was divulged that Gen. Grant had stood between the Confederate officers and this desire to bring them to such a trial. Gen. Grant based his opposition to such trials upon the terms that he, representing the United States, had given in the quotation that I have read. In this hearing Gen. Grant testified, among other things, to the following:

"I frequently had to intercede for Gen. Lee and other paroled officers on the ground that their parole, so long as they obeyed the laws of the United States, protected them from arrest and trial. The President at that time occupied exactly the reverse ground, viz, that they should be tried and punished. He wanted to know when the time would come that they should be punished. I told him not so long as they obeyed the laws and complied with the stipulation. That was the ground I took."

In reading Gen. Grant's memoirs I was struck by the fact that with characteristic modesty he makes no mention of this very notable incident which I believe history will determine to have been one of the most noble displays of his great and generous character.

On July 23, 1885, this great man passed away at Mount McGregor, N. Y. His name and his deeds have passed into history. Without question he stands as the first representative of American military genius. Accompanied by his military successes and abilities were those magnificent traits of character, nobility, and integrity of soul that will ever make him in the minds of the American people one of their noblest citizens.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

George Washington occupies a unique position in the minds of the American people as the Father of his Country. From the time of Washington, however, Abraham Lincoln will ever remain the most colossal figure in American life and the most influential upon its history. His entire life is surrounded by an atmosphere of romance, of pathos, of sadness, and of true greatness. From his birth in a humble log cabin in Kentucky to his tragic death in this Capital City his life was one of constant struggle and full of sadness. His grandfather, a pioneer of Kentucky, was killed by Indians. His father was a man of very slight education, but his mother, Nancy Hanks, though lacking in book learning, was a woman of superior natural ability, of exalted character, and of high spiritual temperament. To her maternal influence is attributed many of the most marked phases of the great emancipator's character.

When Lincoln was still a boy the family moved from Kentucky to Indiana and later to Illinois. Later his father, Thomas Lincoln, married Mrs. Sallie Johnston, of Elizabethtown, Ky. The new mother brought much comfort into the home of the hardy pioneer, and was throughout her life greatly beloved by the future President. The story of Lincoln's boyhood and early manhood has been frequently recited. His early trip to New Orleans down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers on a flatboat gave him his first intimate knowledge of the more severe features of slavery. In New Orleans he saw black men and women sold on the auction block, and he registered a vow to do his utmost to abolish that institution in this country. He kept store in Sangamon County, Ill.; he split rails for the fences to mark the lines between the lands of the various pioneers, and, indeed, performed all manner of physical work to which his great bodily strength was adapted. In the meantime, however, he was reading and studying as opportunity offered. His opportunity of a choice of books was limited, but the books that he did study were of the highest quality. They included the Bible, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Æsop's Fables, Robinson Crusoe, and Weems's Life of Washington. The religious character of his reading undoubtedly affected and contributed to the purity of his later style of composition. In the meantime he made a study of law, and in 1837 was admitted to the bar of Illinois at Springfield at the age of 28. In 1843 Mr. Lincoln was defeated for Congress, but was successful in 1846. His fame commenced, however, after his term in Congress, when, in 1854, he entered into his famous debates with Stephen A. Douglas, who was at that time one of the leading orators of the United States, and subsequently the contestant with Mr. Lincoln for the Presidency. The speeches which he made in those great debates from the same platform with Mr. Douglas were widely published and attracted the attention of the country. The tenor of his great argument was contained in a single sentence: "The Government can not endure half slave and half free." Lincoln became the candidate of his party for United States Senator as against Mr. Douglas, and although he received a majority of the popular vote of the State the assembly districts were so constituted that he failed to receive the necessary vote in the joint session of the State legislature. While he was sorely disappointed at this result, it undoubtedly contributed greatly to his selection in 1860 as the candidate of his party for the Presidency.

Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated as President on March 4, 1861. Several of the Southern States had already seceded from the Union, and there was great excitement and a tense situation throughout the country. At that time Mr. Lincoln's thought was all for the preservation of the Union, and he sincerely desired the avoidance of war. In his inaugural address, delivered on that day, he used the following expressions:

"The power confided in me will be used to hold, occupy, and possess the property and places belonging to the Government and to collect the duties and imposts, but beyond what may be necessary for these objects there will be no invasion, no use of force among the people anywhere.

"In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war. The Government will not assail you. You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors."

The story of Lincoln's services and experiences during the Civil War have filled volumes and are now known to all students of our history. With him it was a constant struggle with two forces: one which was not in sympathy with the war and desired to minimize and suppress all war activities; the other so impetuous and often thoughtless that it would avoid all prudence and attempt to accomplish things for which neither the country nor the Army was yet prepared. Many of the leading publicists and great newspapers of the North were constantly nagging the President to proceed more swiftly than the conditions would permit. The cry, "On to Richmond," which would have sent our Army unprepared against a valiant foe within defensive lines, was one which gave the President great concern. Many disasters in arms to the Union cause were created by the urgings of these zealous but indiscreet friends of the Union. Horace Greeley, the great editor of the New York Tribune, with a sincere devotion to the Union and a heart as gentle as a child's, was a serious offender in matters of this kind. The President was also pressed by the extreme abolitionists. While Lincoln himself was a strong abolitionist, above all things he desired to preserve the Union of States. In reply to one of the letters of Mr. Greeley in 1862, Lincoln gave his position on this subject in the following language:

"If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that."

Lincoln's just estimate of his associates, who often were his political rivals, attested the greatness and nobility of his character. He was nominated for the Presidency after a severe struggle with several of the leaders and organizers of the Republican Party. Upon his election he appointed several of these men in his Cabinet—William H. Seward, his chief rival, Secretary of State, and Salmon P. Chase as Secretary of the Treasury. All the members of his Cabinet in the early part of his first administration undoubtedly considered themselves superior to Mr. Lincoln in statesmanship and knowledge of government. Mr. Seward early in the history of that administration submitted a suggestion which had been agreed upon by the other members of the Cabinet that the President should practically turn over the administration of the Government to himself—Seward—and the other members of the Cabinet. Mr. Lincoln, with his characteristic patience and breadth of view, manifested no indignation at this request, but replied to it in such a way as to leave no doubt in the minds of the Cabinet members that he not only felt fully competent to perform the duties of President but that he intended to do so. This was expressed in such a clear way that no attempt of this kind was ever subsequently made.

Washington's Farewell Address is a wonderful exposition of the foresight and deep wisdom of the first President of the United States, stated in simple and direct terms, which is the highest form of eloquence. But no American statesman or orator has equaled Lincoln in the eloquent statement of great truths in brief and concise language. In 1864 one of the great political parties in its national convention, in the form of resolutions which are usually spoken of as the platform of the party, set forth that the war was a failure and nominated one of the distinguished soldiers of the war as its candidate for President. Mr. Lincoln was overwhelmingly elected, and in his second inaugural address showed his great determination and tenacity of purpose in the following language:

"Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that the mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled up by the bondsmen's 250 years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said 3,000 years ago, so still it must be said 'the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.'"

In depth of feeling and tenderness of expression, nothing in American literature surpasses the letter written by President Lincoln to Mrs. Bixby, of Massachusetts, who had lost five sons on the field of battle. The great Lincoln wrote as follows:

"I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the adjutant general of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the fields of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any word of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I can not refrain from tendering you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom."

The culminating expression of Lincoln's great heart is contained in his address on the battle field of Gettysburg when that hallowed ground was dedicated as a national cemetery. It was framed by Mr. Lincoln partly before leaving the White House, and partly on the train en route, the last sentences being scribbled upon a scrap of paper with a lead pencil. This great address, containing less than 300 words, is generally admitted among men of letters to be one of the finest compositions in the English language and incomparably the better of any address delivered upon a like occasion. While it can be repeated by hundreds of thousands of school children, its brevity and trenchant patriotism make it appropriate upon any occasion of this character, and I make no apology for repeating it here. Mr. Lincoln said:

"Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

"Now we are engaged in a great civil war testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place of those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

"But in a larger sense we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow, this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to the cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

The tragic end of this great life occurred in this Capital City, April 15, 1865, in a house on Tenth Street opposite Ford's Theater, where the assassin Booth shot the President on the preceding night. The scene has been many times graphically described and is familiar to you all. The great soul of Abraham Lincoln passed from earth to meet the judgment of the Master whom he had so faithfully served. The record of his life is one of the cherished treasures of the American people. It has been an encouragement and incentive to thousands of men surrounded, as was Lincoln, in their earlier years with poverty to lives of usefulness and value to their communities and their country. Not only is the life of Lincoln influential upon the youth of America, but upon those of every other civilized country in the world. His life is immortal in its influence upon mankind.

So long as the American Republic lasts, even though it may extend to thousands or tens of thousands of years, Lincoln and Grant will stand out as the great figures of the Civil War and exemplars of the highest type of man produced by American traditions and American life.

Martin W. Littleton, one of counsel who prosecuted the case against the expelled socialist members of the assembly, answers in the following article the arguments set forth by Morris Hillquit, counsel for the defense, in the magazine of the Evening Post on April 17.

[By Martin W. Littleton.]

The very essence of our definitive American civilization as embodied in a written Constitution is evaded and obscured by the socialists and those who join them in their protest against expulsion from the assembly. We are not, nor were we, designed to be a democracy nor even a representative democracy. We did not erect a government upon the shifting currents and popular gusts of opinion. Our fathers earnestly sought one thing, and one thing only, "the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—not as a nation but as individuals.

These are "unalienable," imperishable—these were never to be referred to the caprice, humor, or indignation of a majority. It was thought that as a means to secure these rights a government "deriving its just power from the consent of the governed" would be most effective. But it was not the object merely to create a government resting upon the consent of the governed. This would surely be a democracy, but it might be the very death of liberty.

Too often have democracy and liberty been confounded and confused. The power of a democracy resides in the majority. This is its original source of government, but "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" was for the individual against all governments and forms of governments. These were and are and must continue to be the very vitals of American civilization. These are the very fundamentals of a constitutional government; not merely a written constitution, but a constitution which scientifically and searchingly withdrew from the power of the masses or the classes the individual right "to life, liberty,

It not only withdrew this, but sanctified it as the whole sum and object of our civilization. If this right is destroyed, either peaceably or forcibly, our American civilization is destroyed, our definitive representative Republic is destroyed—all that there is of value or vitality, all that there is of essence or spirit, is gone. We would still have a mass of writing testifying to the existence of a new and strange absolutism and marking the place where liberty was destroyed, but our own civilization would disappear.

Democracy is a method of government—a registration of mass opinion. Life, liberty, property, or the pursuit of happiness, these are individual—indispensable to the very me of my life. These flee from all governments of all descriptions when they suspect that they are to be circumscribed, hampered, or suppressed. These enjoy a realm of their own, wrapping themselves around individuals, kindling the fires of ambition, stimulating them to daring deeds, pushing them on to high achievements. Democracy simply expresses the power of the mass—corrective, restraining, but rarely creating. "Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—these express the precious attributes of the individual—initiating, devising, exploring, creating, and constructing.

The question which runs to the very heart of the age is not what manner of government shall we have but what manner of man will we leave after we have spread government all over his life, his liberty, and his pursuit of happiness. Well, then, what of the Socialist, and why expel him and disfranchise him? Because the whole aim of his conspiracy is to destroy the civilization of America—to tear out of it the very vertebræ of the Constitution, to take away the right to life as we are now assured we may live it, to destroy the right to liberty as individuals, to abolish the opportunity to pursue happiness as individuals.

The socialist says, "No; we give you a new life"—and so he does. But it is the life of an individual, not oneself, but the life fitted in and fastened to the mass, to rise or fall with its awful weight; to be crushed or solidified with its destiny. The socialist says he will give you new liberty, and so he will—the liberty of empty dreams and dead ambitions, the liberty not to think or grow or hope.

He will give you the liberty of uniting with the mass in resistless force to destroy real liberty, individual liberty—that's it, exactly—the liberty to destroy liberty or, better yet, the license to destroy liberty. The socialist says he will give us the right to pursue a new happiness; and so he will—the right, in concert with others, to combine against all individual pursuits of happiness, to insure the stagnation of economic security.

He will end all of the individual dreams of the individual soul, and you shall never suffer disappointment, for you will cease to hope; and you need never dread privation or despair, for you begin and end with these—the privation of individual aspiration and the despair of individual development.

The socialist says, "I have the right to participate in the Government and send my representatives there, because I intend the overthrow of everything that is vital in your Government and the establishment of mine." And he says, "You have no right to exclude me because I am intent on overthrowing your Government, provided I do it without force." And then some of us who confuse liberty with democracy are puzzled and hesitate and say after all he may be right. To those allow me to put this question:

If the Socialist should obtain control of this Government and begin the destruction of the right to "life, liberty," and property and the "pursuit of happiness," as we profess and live and enjoy it, and should inaugurate his rule of socialism, would you revolt and fight as your fathers did for a Government which insured "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" for the individual? If you would not, then you deserve to lose all of these blessings, because you have degenerated; but if you say you would fight to preserve them, then why allow yourselves to be reduced to a minority where you must rebel against the new order? Why not keep the alien thing out of your political household? Why not, as a masterful majority having liberty, maintain that liberty?

Whether peaceably or by force; whether insidiously or by open violence; whether as the spies of an invisible empire intriguing for the destruction of all nationalism or as the bold bandits and buccaneers of the frightful absolutism of the mob—the question is still the same: Will we voluntarily invite into our State and national councils enemies of that distinctive civilization which we are striving arduously to preserve? Will we suffer the individualism which is the very heart of national existence to be stilled and supinely adjust to our surrendered selves the strait-jacket of uniformity? The issue is squarely joined. We will accept socialism and surrender our civilization or we will exclude it as a voice in our political life and preserve our civilization.

And if some say, "You are destroying representative government," my answer is, I am not destroying anything. I am refusing you the license to destroy liberty. I will not guarantee representative government to you who reject it in order to enable you to take it from me, whose whole object is to preserve it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HALVOR STEENERSON,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill becomes necessary by reason of the fact that the Clayton Antitrust Act passed in 1914 contained a clause that on its face appeared to legalize cooperative associations of farmers to organize for the sale of their products, but it was so worded that it did not apply to associations having capital stock, and hence the contention has been made that such associations are illegal. Thousands of cooperative farmers' organizations exist in the different States, all with capital stock—such as creameries, elevator companies, stock-exchange associations, and so on. So long as they confine their business to their respective States they are legal because beyond the power of Congress, which only regulates commerce among the States.

But there never was any reason for outlawing them in interstate commerce, and the clause in the Clayton Act was really a joker, for had its effect been understood at the time it would not have passed. The object of this proposed measure is to give the farmers the same right to combine as is enjoyed by business men, and there is no danger in this, for the Secretary of Agriculture is given power to prevent an abuse of the power where it tends to monopolize or unduly advance prices. The farmer now must sell his products to the middlemen for what they choose to give, and the result is that the spread between the price the farmer gets and the consumer pays is very great. In many instances he gets two or three times what he pays the farmer for the products.

The contention that this measure will tend to increase prices to the consumer is unfounded. Under these organizations the farmers can in many cases sell directly to the consumer, and thereby eliminate the profits of the speculator or middleman. It will, above all, encourage food production, and in the end lower prices to the public. The bill carefully guards the interest of the consuming public, and the only real opposition to it comes from the large trusts and combines, who desire to continue to enjoy a monopoly in the purchase of farm products. I regard this measure as one of the most important to the continued welfare of the people of the country, and I hope it will be speedily enacted into law.

Adjusted Pay for Service Men.

OF

HON. JOHN M. BAER,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 29, 1920.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, having introduced one of the first bills for adjusted compensation for the soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war, it is with a great deal of satisfaction that I now see a measure which is about to become a law. Over a year ago I introduced one of the first measures for this purpose. At that time I made a speech urging immediate action on the measure. I argued that it was only the part of justice to compensate them for the actual losses they sustained while in the service. I also said that an additional amount should be paid to each person who served in the uniform, so that he could share in a small degree the unparalleled prosperity of profiteers at home. It is only fair play.

In order to prove that I am not a recent recruit to this cause, I shall quote from a speech I made on March 3, 1919:

"Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret that this third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress will adjourn without passing the urgent legislation required to adequately meet the imperative needs of the reconstruction period. There are many important bills which have been before the committee for months and which should have been brought out upon this floor. They would have passed this body with very little opposition on either the Republican or Democratic side of the House. I have introduced a bill to give to all soldiers, sailors, and marines one year's additional pay. I have indisputable evidence that an overwhelming number of discharged soldiers, especially the men with families and other dependents to support, are in need of funds to reinstate them in civil life. It is my intention to reintroduce the bill and urge its immediate passage at the coming extra session, which is inevitable, owing to the vast amount of necessary legislation which will be immediately required to meet the after-war problems. It was my earnest hope that the bill would pass, so as to meet the present needs of the situation until legislation could be enacted that would adequately provide for the future welfare of the men who have served their country with great honor to themselves and credit to our Nation.

"I have also introduced a bill which supplements the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior and multiplies opportunities for the discharged soldier. The measure provides that these men who so gallantly offered their lives to our Nation shall have an opportunity for education and training in the vocational lines which they desire to follow. I have talked to over 300,000 soldiers in the camps, and I believe I have had an unusual privilege to sense their needs. I know that many have been awakened to the great advantages they are able to obtain under our free institutions. We should open the door of opportunity to all men who desire to better their conditions. I believe that there will be much severe criticism of the present administration for not having a definite program of reconstruction and for delaying the legislation which is so important in order to meet the critical conditions which become increasingly more difficult to solve.

"After the Civil War the homestead act proved to be a magic wand in settling the West. The public domain formed the safety valve of economic discontent. But now we face a new problem. Since the sixties there has sprung up in this country a monopolistic control of our markets. Profiteers, gamblers, and speculators have clogged the channels of trade. They must be removed or we shall find that the new farmers will not stay upon the proposed farms. Some of the defects in our old system have been described by Dr. Elwood Mead in these words:

"Science should have gone hand in hand with the settlement of the arid and semiarid country, and all that science could give would have been utilized, first, in the creation of the conditions of settlement and then in aiding the settler in difficult tasks. Because nothing was done these heroic but uninformed souls were bedeviled by the winds, cold, drought, and insect pests. They wasted their efforts, lost their hopes and ambitions, and a tragic percentage left impoverished and embittered. The tragic part of this history is that nearly all this suffering and loss could have been avoided under a carefully thought-out plan of development.

"Those soldiers who are sons of farmers, and they are chiefly the ones who will take up the land, already know the injustice and inequities in our present method of distribution. They know the farmer only received 36 cents out of a normal dollar, and now only 18 cents out of a "50-cent" dollar.

"With the great land movement must come a new economic freedom, or the whole comprehensive scheme of back to the land will fail. Other nations are now meeting this problem. It is time that we, right here in this Congress, take action."

As I stated, I made this speech over a year ago. I believe that if Congress had taken action at that time we would not have been confronted by such a large appropriation as the present one. But often, owing to dilatory methods, we delay such matters, and the cost to the country is greater than it would have been if we had taken immediate action.

For instance, if the returned soldier had received six months' pay a year ago instead of the mere "tip" of $60, there would have been no more demand for this so-called "bonus" legislation, which, in truth, is not a bonus at all but just compensation for actual service performed. I think a lesser amount would have satisfied the service men then, because it was just when they returned home, and it required ready money to reinstate them in civil life. They wanted to buy a new outfit—such as clothes, shoes, and other necessaries—to take the place of those that they had outgrown or discarded upon being called to the colors.

When I first demanded adjusted compensation it was not as popular a cause as it is to-day. The American Legion and other soldier organizations had not yet been organized. After the American Legion received its official charter from Congress—a measure which I supported—the local legions began to make their influence effectively felt. An election was held in Wisconsin, and the people voted 3 to 1 for a soldiers' compensation law. I received numerous resolutions containing thousands of names from all parts of the country. North Dakota passed a law giving each soldier $25 a month for each month served, providing, however, that he invest the sum in a home, a farm, or in the furtherance of his education. Minnesota was compelled to follow the action of North Dakota and so were other States. About the time it became extremely popular among the people, it became very unpopular with the profiteers, the big bankers of Wall Street, and the big interests who, according to the provisions of the bill, will be compelled to pay the greater part of the burden, and which, according to all rules of equity, they should. The people will not pay this bill.

My action on this matter has been in full accord with the legislature of my State. In fact, the plan submitted by the American Legion is similar to the North Dakota plan, with one exception, and that one is the proposal in this measure to also give a cash payment. Congress has received the hearty cooperation of the officers of the American Legion in their fourfold plan, and also many letters from individual ex-soldiers.

Recently I made a statement for the Stars and Stripes, a soldiers' paper printed here in Washington, and I received many wires and letters commending my position. I have also donated several articles and cartoons to soldiers' papers and for their cause. I was among the few Members who first petitioned the leaders of the House to expedite hearings and action on this legislation. I hope that the Senate will immediately pass it, so that the soldiers will at once be assured of the benefits of this act.

The Wall Street Journal of August 17, 1919, severely criticized me for introducing the first bill. I shall not take the time to quote the article. This was followed by a barrage attack of all the reactionary publications of the profiteers. They have been sniping this bill ever since, and are getting in their best shots this very day. Just about a year after the Journal's attack I am glad to be voting for a bill for the soldiers. Recently I introduced a bill which is designed not to do away with legitimate stock exchanges but parasitical gamblers and speculators, who add no legitimate transaction to the functions of distribution. And again the Wall Street Journal devotes much space in an attack on my present bill. Is it possible that—judged by its previous attack on my soldiers' legislation—Congress will be passing an antigambling bill in a year from now? Time will tell. If the present orgy of hoarding, gambling, and speculation in the necessaries of life keeps up, I am sure that some kind of such legislation will be enacted into law. I could have asked for "personal privilege" on the floor of this House to answer these attacks, but if a man advocates anything progressive a year in advance in these times it would require all his time answering attacks made upon him. The satisfaction always lies in the results.

Considerable criticism is made regarding the tax features of this measure. But where do they come from? They come from the big business interests, which have made a half dollar in profits for nearly every dollar spent in the war. The war cost thirty-six billions, and eighteen billions, went to making millionaires. It does not come with good grace to hear these exploiters of war's horrors—men who have taken advantage of the soldiers, their mothers, wives, and families—squirming because a slight tax is placed on their huge incomes. They have never paid their proportional share of taxation, and they are now trying to prevent anyone from being in Congress who insists that they must pay their equitable share.

There was no complaint raised about taxation by the gentlemen of Wall Street when we appropriated over two and one-half billions to pay off illegal and informal war contracts. Oh, no. Why do they cry now? They did not complain when Congress guaranteed millions in dividends and billions in "water" to the railroads of the country. The gentlemen who oppose this measure did not make a fight when wealth wanted a "bonus," but when the soldier who offered his life—the human element—was to be considered they have used every subtle means possible to defeat the proposal.

Here is the manner in which the revenue is to be raised to pay the soldiers' adjusted compensation:

1. An additional surtax on individual incomes of 1 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $10,000; 2 per cent from $10,000 to $26,000; and 3 per cent of incomes in excess of $26,000. (This provision is estimated to yield $108,000,000 per annum.)

2. A tax equivalent to one-fifth of 1 per cent on the sale of stocks and bonds. (This provision is estimated to yield $190,000,000 per annum.)

3. A tax equivalent to one-half of 1 per cent on the sale of real estate. (This provision is estimated to yield $50,000,000 per annum.)

4. An increase of approximately 15 per cent in the existing tax on cigars and tobacco and of approximately 25 per cent of the tax on cigarettes. (This provision is estimated to yield $55,000,000 per annum.)

5. An excise tax on corporations issuing stock dividends subsequent to March 15, 1920, equivalent to 10 per cent of the value of stock so issued. (This provision is estimated to yield $45,000,000 on stock dividends already declared and $7,500,000 per annum on future stock dividends.)

Can anyone show where these taxes fall on the people? None of these taxes are placed upon the necessaries of life. I personally opposed the sales tax on consumption, and I am glad it was stricken out.

The war profiteers will pay this tax. There seems to be an impression among certain reactionary newspapers that there are no profiteers. This false idea has been caused by the fact that the Department of Justice with its numerous employees is unable to find them and therefore tax collectors would not be able to chase them down and compel them to pay the taxes devised in this measure to raise the revenue to pay the soldiers this extra pay for their services.

I want to call the attention of the people of this country to some official figures on war profits which have been given out in a report to the United States Senate. I think these facts will prove that there will be little difficulty in finding profiteers because the proof is in the United States Treasury Department. There can be no question raised as to the authenticity of these statistics.

These profits will show how "patriotic" some capitalists were during the war. It will show immense dividends over which the farmer, soldier, and laborer had no control. The figures show net profits; that is, the profits after all excess-profits taxes and income taxes have been deducted. The figures prove conclusively that these profits were not due to increased production, but that these corporations took a larger proportion of the consumer's dollar.

Take a few, for example:

	Profits 1912–1914.	Profits 1916–1918.	Increase in profits.
			Per cent.
Copper	19.7	54.0	270
Steel	6.1	26.9	441
Clothing	3.9	22.6	580
Packers	14.4	36.9	256
Sugar	6.5	19.1	294

Total for 29 corporations show that the average profit in 1912 to 1914 was 8.6 per cent, while in 1916 to 1918 it was 23.9 per cent. This is nearly 25 per cent on their capital stock—and mind you, it is after all income taxes and excess-profits taxes were paid. Every four years these profiteering corporations could have nearly replaced their capital stock, which in many instances contained much "water."

Compare this with the income of the farmer, who, according to evidence made available by the Agricultural Department, made on an average of less than 4 per cent. It would take a farmer 25 years of hard work to replace his capital while corporations throughout the country replaced their capital in four years. According to the figures, a farmer could buy a new farm every four years if he were fortunate enough to be one of these privileged corporations. In Iowa the return on farms was only 3 per cent, and Iowa is a rich farming State.

But this 25 per cent is only an average. Let us see what some of the individual corporations made, according to this reliable report, which is taken from their own statements. It must be considered that these corporations took large exemptions in their reports for salaries, replacement, overhead, exemption of stock dividends, and other evasions. For example, one salary paid by the American Metal Co. was $364,000. I have not heard of any teacher, laboring man, or clerk receiving a salary like this during the war or at any other time.

These figures furnish plausible ground to estimate the real profits of corporations at about $1,200 for each family in the United States and still be conservative.

In Senate Document 259 it shows that 20,000 corporations made a profit, after paying all taxes, of 33½ per cent, while 5,724 made 50 per cent, and 2,030—one-tenth—made 100 per cent. In other words, over 2,000 corporations replaced their total capital stock every year during the war. A farmer or merchant in North Dakota could not replace his money actually invested in over 20 years, but these patrioteers robbed the people by equaling the capital in one year.

From 1916 to 1918 the coal companies made a clear profit of over one billion. The oil companies made $800,000,000 from 1912 to 1918. Over a billion dollars were turned over to the steel industries in three years. The copper interests made net profits of one-half billion dollars during four years, and most of the capital is fictitious. Numerous others could be cited which would show an alarming concentration of wealth in this country. These are the insidious influences that are trying to kill the soldiers' pay bill through their kept newspapers.

These papers did not complain when we gave war contractors $3,000,000,000 on illegal and informal contracts. They did not raise their voice when the railroads looted the Treasury of millions in dividends and Congress guaranteed billions in watered stock. We give wealth a "bonus," with no criticism from these privileged interests; but oh!—when the soldiers want justice—it is dangerous, a waste of public money, especially when we tax these profiteers to pay for it.

I want to call the attention of the House to the "king of profiteers." He made 299,999 per cent profit. His capital was $5,000; his profits $14,549,952.

It is unbelievable, but this incredible profit is shown on page 367 of the Treasury report. After deducting all income taxes and excess-profits taxes, this steel firm made 212,584 per cent on its capital stock. This company did not stand alone, for another made net earnings of 20,180 per cent. A farmer with $5,000 capital invested in a farm could have bought over 2,000 farms at the end of the year if he had made this profit. But the farmer only makes one twenty-fifth on his money invested, and this does not allow any fat salary, either.

Does it seem fair and just for these corporations, who have bled the country for four years, to complain when a soldier who earned a dollar a day asks, through his organization—the American Legion—for a small amount in adjusted compensation to pay him for losses sustained while in the service?

The American soldier, through his daring and valor, brought an early victory. It was generally conceded that the war would last one year more than it did. But by winning the war in such a short period the soldiers saved this country at least $20,000,000,000. In view of the fact that the victory veterans saved billions, and also considering the fact that profiteers made untold billions in excess profits during the war, I can see no argument for voting against this bill, and I am going to vote for it with a greater degree of pleasure than I have fought for it.

I want to take this opportunity to again call the attention of the country to the splendid record of North Dakota in the late war. North Dakota, in proportion to men serving, stands third in all the States of the Union in most men lost on the field of battle. In proportion to its population it had more men under actual fire than any State. The Battle of Soissons, which has been called the "turning point of the war," was won by regiments in which North Dakota men predominated. The Second Regiment of North Dakota volunteers was raised in four hours as a result of the proclamation of the governor, the shortest time in which any regiment was ever raised in the United States. Thousands of others served in the war and at home, and every patriotic citizen in my State wants the soldiers to receive this adjusted compensation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letters:

J. H. WEAVER & Co.,
COAL, BITUMINOUS AND GAS,
Philadelphia, May 26, 1920.

Hon. B. K. FOCHT,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FOCHT: I return herewith letter to you from Mr. Morrow, vice president of the National Coal Association, together with copy of his letter of May 22 to Senator WALSH. I am not familiar with the Senator's speech referred to in Mr. Morrow's letter, but I have read the reply of the National Coal Association with a great deal of interest.

There has been some talk about the high price of coal. While I do not know it of my own knowledge, I have been told that bituminous coal has sold in New York Harbor at prices ranging from $22 to $25 per ton during the past 30 to 60 days. This is unusual and should not be taken into consideration for the reason that the numerous strikes which prevailed there recently prevented cars loaded with coal from reaching New York, in consequence of which they were dumped at other ports, such as Baltimore and Philadelphia, and barged to New York. The party who undertook to do this ran the risk of the situation clearing to such an extent that coal could be dumped at New York, when he would have had to take a great deal less for his coal upon arrival there than it cost him. However, the strike continued and these parties who assumed this risk found many distressed for coal, and accordingly exacted a high price. They were not, so far as I know, large coal interests, and perhaps they may have been only barge people.

If the price of coal is too high, it is due solely to lack of cars and motive power to move empties to the mines for loading. Mines are idle waiting for cars, and what little coal the operator produces costs him a sum far beyond what you would imagine, when overhead and all other items are taken into consideration.

I do not like high prices prevailing with any commodity, and coal prices, I can assure you, would be much lower if the Government had turned the roads back to their owners with adequate motive power and cars to promptly move the fuel which the miners are willing to dig. You will remember that during the period of Federal control, in order to keep business moving the Government bought quite a large number of cars, many of which, I understand, cost in the neighborhood of $3,000 each. The owners of the properties, I understand, demurred to taking some of these cars at the price paid for them by the Government, which was terrific, and they were only sane when they did it. However, costs have continued to advance, and it now appears that the cars can not be bought for any less cost.

In my opinion the railroad managers to-day are to be pitied. They are able men and are doing their very best, but you know as well as I that it is useless to try to run a newspaper without ink and type. Apparently, however, the American people want the railroad managers to move passengers and freight without engines and cars.

I have been suffering from a wretched cold, which has deferred my visit to Washington. I am thinking about going to Williamsport to-night, to remain there a couple of days to look after some matters of importance, and doubtless I shall return by way of Washington. If I do, I will not overlook wiring you in advance.

I thank you for sending me the letters referred to, and sincerely hope you will not forget me when you receive any similar information in the future.

Yours. very truly,

J. H. WEAVER.

NATIONAL COAL ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1920.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: There are occasional indiscriminate charges that the bituminous-coal industry during the war made enormous profits. As a Representative of the public, you are doubtless interested in the facts in this matter as revealed by official publications. As a matter of information, therefore, I am handing you herewith copy of an open letter to Senator WALSH of Massachusetts on this subject.

Yours, very truly,

J. D. A. MORROW,
Vice President.

NATIONAL COAL ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1920.

The Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I have read your speech on profiteering with much interest, but I am constrained to deny your statements concerning the profits of the bituminous-coal industry. To my mind, it is necessary to refute the indiscriminate charge that the bituminous-coal industry made preposterous profits during the war. Let me, therefore, direct your attention to official figures on this subject which you have either overlooked or disregarded.

You cite Mr. McAdoo's report on corporate earnings printed as Senate Document No. 259 as your chief authority. The unfairness of that report is notorious. Mr. McAdoo's letter of transmittal itself states that he selected only companies "which in 1917 earned 15 per cent or more on their capital stock." In 1917 there were about 7,000 separate coal producers. His report, therefore, covers only about 6 per cent of the total number. It plainly includes the fortunate 392 who, because of specially favorable mining conditions, with low production costs compared with selling prices or on account of merely nominal capitalization, made 15 per cent or more on their capital stock. It says nothing of the other 94 per cent, some 6,600 operators, who admittedly made less than 15 per cent. Even the percentages quoted for the 392 concerns are no true measure of profits, because they are based on capital stock, when the report itself shows that many of these companies had invested far more than their capitalization. Consequently, any such conclusions as yours, based on that report, are manifestly unfair and misleading.

Further, with regard to alleged huge profits in 1917, the United States Geological Survey report on coal production for 1917, page 958, shows that the total output of bituminous coal in 1917 was sold by the operators at an average price of only $2.26 per ton at the mines, out of which all operating expenses, fixed charges, and taxes had to be paid before any profit remained.

Throughout 1918 prices were under control of the Government. On November 19, 1919, Dr. Garfield, United States Fuel Administrator, stated publicly that the average price allowed the bituminous operators for 1918 was only $2.61 per ton. He stated further that this permitted them an average "margin" of 46 cents per ton. Dr. Garfield was careful to explain that out of this "margin" Federal taxes of 30 cents per ton and some other deductions had to be made before the operators had any profits. Let me refer you, also, to the report of the United States Bituminous Coal Commission, page 41, where the tax returns to the Treasury of some 1,551 bituminous coal-mining companies are tabulated for 1918. These companies produce about one-third of the total output of bituminous coal, and after examination of the companies included the United States Geological Survey advised the commission that these companies represented fairly the conditions throughout the industry. Please observe that 337 of the 1,551 operators reported losses and that after deducting taxes the average per cent of net income to invested capital for the 1,214 companies reporting profits was less than 11 per cent, and for the entire number of 1,551 companies was only 9.72 per cent.

In this connection, I trust you will remember that coal mining is a hazardous business and can not be judged by the standards of return which are properly applicable to safer enterprises. At the outset the operator must invest in hundreds of acres of coal land, parts of which may afterwards turn out to be unworkable. He must sink his money in miles of underground tunnels and install expensive machinery far below the surface, all of which investment is subject to rapid destruction or total loss by explosions, fires, falls of slate, sulphurous mine water, and other physical conditions. At any time he may encounter irregularities in the coal deposits which will run his mining costs up to prohibitive figures. No 6 or 8 per cent return is adequate for capital which must encounter such risks.

As for 1919, the evidence obtained by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN'S subcommittee of the Senate which has been inquiring into coal conditions since last August shows that, following the lifting of the Fuel Administration control, prices under competition in the open market sank to ess than the Fuel Administration maximum limits. The only exceptions to this general downward price movement were certain high-grade coals of special value which have always commanded a premium in the open market. At the same time, on account of the additional increase in the cost of material and on account of greater lost time, mining costs advanced. It is common knowledge that in 1919 profits were less than in 1918.

The Federai Trade Commission has recently issued two reports on costs and selling prices of bituminous coal, showing that the operators' "margins" in January and February, 1920, were only about half the "margins" of 1918. The reports state that the "margins" shown are not profit, because selling expenses, interest on investment, and Federal taxes are still to be deducted.

The sale of a few cars of coal at high prices may be heralded broadcast as evidencing the general level of bituminous coal prices. Nothing is even said of the millions of tons moving currently at low prices. Some bituminous coal is doubtless being sold to-day at relatively high prices, but under present operating conditions high prices are inevitable.

An acute transportation shortage, rendering mine operation very irregular and costly, has been accentuated by unfair discrimination in the distribution of empty coal cars to the mines. Under special authorization from the Interstate Commerce Commission and in the face of the most vigorous protests from the bituminous coal operators, the railroads are giving a full supply of cars to those mines supplying their locomotives with coal and are running these mines six days per week. They are scattering the remaining handfull of cars among the other mines, which supply the public utilities, the industrial plants, and the domestic consumers of the country. Hundreds of mines thus discriminated against are prevented from shipping coal on more than four or five days per month, but all the expense of maintaining these mines goes on just the same. Some of them normally hoist 10, 15, and 20 tons of water daily for every ton of coal produced. This water must be pumped regardless of whether coal is being shipped or not. The workings must be kept ventilated, tracks cleaned of falls of slate and rock, and the property maintained. Such irregular conditions in the last few weeks have increased production costs at hundreds of mines from $1 to $3 per ton. Thus, at the same time that this system of discriminatory car distribution is depriving the industrial consumer and ordinary householder of his coal, it is doubling the cost of producing the little tonnage which is available for him.

There can be no permanent improvement of coal conditions in America proceeding from misinformation and misunderstanding of the elemental facts. I am satisfied that you are sincere in your desire for constructive betterment, and, therefore, I am taking the time to bring this information to your attention. We shall be glad at any time to give you or any other public official the facts on conditions in this industry.

Since your speech has been so widely quoted, I deem it only fair to make this letter public.

Yours, very truly, (Signed) J. D. A. MORROW,
Vice President.

The Budget Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. BASCOM SLEMP,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 29, 1920.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, there is so much confusion in the country generally as to the condition of our Treasury that I have given some study to the subject, and I hope a brief statement will serve in some degree to clarify the situation.

The estimated receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920—ordinary and Panama Canal—are and will be approximately as follows:

Customs	$310,000,000
Internal revenue:
Income and profits taxes	4,000,000,000
Miscellaneous and internal revenue	1,409,000,000
From sales of public lands	1,500,000
From miscellaneous sources	778,503,762
Panama Canal tolls	7,200,000
Total estimated receipts	6,506,203,762

The estimated expenditures for this period are:

Ordinary and special, to April 30, 1920, actual	$5,533,506,249.44
Estimated for May	425,000,000.00
Estimated for June	522,000,000.00
Total estimated expenditures	6,480,506,249.44

The amount between revenues and expenditures may be stated as follows:

Total estimated receipts	$6,506,203,762.00
Total estimated expenditures	6,480,506,249.44
Excess of revenues	25,697,512.56

This expenditure of $6,480,506,249.44 includes the ordinary expenditures of all the departments of the Government. It includes the entire interest on the public debt for the year. It includes over $1,300,000,000 paid to the railroads, of which $415,000,000 will be paid out this fiscal year as a result of the passage of the Esch-Cummins bill. It includes loans to our allies in cash of about $450,000,000; it includes $2,400,000,000 paid out in cash on war contracts, leaving a hang over only of such obligations of a little over $100,000,000. It also includes $150,000,000 paid to the War Finance Corporation, which, in effect, may be regarded as an investment in Government securities, inasmuch as the corporation has on hand of Liberty and Victory loans $221,437,906.99, and certificates of indebtedness amount to $189,800,000, a total of $411,237,906.99, and does not have commitments for loans to a greater extent than $150,000,000, and it also includes $442,000,000 paid in cash to the Shipping Board and other items of an extraordinary nature.

It will thus be seen that the revenues of the Government this year have been just about sufficient to take care of the expenses of the Government, including the extraordinary items that I have given, without resort to the sale of additional Government securities during the fiscal year.

However, the Treasury received on September 1, 1919, during the fiscal year, $1,032,000,000 as a result of the deferred payments of the Victory loans, thereby also increasing the public debt by that amount. The fact that the ordinary receipts of the Government about balanced the expenditures, as before stated, enabled the Government to use these proceeds in the discharge and retirement of other Government obligations; and this is just what was done:

The bonds of Liberty loans (first to fourth, inclusive) retired and to be retired this fiscal year, by June 30, 1920, will amount to	$970,000,000
Net retirement of war-savings stamps and certificates	120,000,000
Total net retirement of Government securities for fiscal year	1,090,000,000

It will thus be seen that the Treasury has retired this fiscal year about $60,000,000 more of national securities than it received from the sale of Government securities during the year. But this is not all. Treasury certificates, through a reduction in the general fund, had been reduced up to April 30, 1920, $637,962,934.44, with the probability that they will be still further reduced by the end of the fiscal year, leaving a working balance at the same time in the Treasury sufficient for all practical needs. I do not know whether the Treasury Department anticipated so good a showing this year or not, nor do I care. It would make no difference what any one might have guessed a year ago. I believe the showing for this fiscal year is better than was anticipated and as matter of fact better than has been stated by Treasury officials. It should serve at least to dispel some of the pessimism which seems recently to have been cultivated so generally in the country. The gross public debt, including Treasury certificates, as of June 30, 1919, was $25,584,506,160.05. On July 25, 1919, the Secretary of the Treasury said "that this amount should be increased by not more than the amount of deferred installments of the Victory loan, making a total public debt on June 30, 1920," to use his words, of $26,516,506,160.05.

The gross public debt, however, as of April 30, 1920, was $24,944,677,796.75, and will probably be $200,000,000 less by June 30, 1920, I am reliably informed. If that be the case, the public debt on June 30, 1920, will be $24,744,677,796.75 instead of $26,516,506,160, as expected by the Secretary of the Treasury in his statement in July, 1919. In other words the Treasury is $1,771,828,563.25 better off at the end of the fiscal year than was expected. There was a reduction in the general fund during the fiscal year, however, of $942,107,207.23, which, if deducted from the $1,771,828,563.25 would leave $829,721,356.02 that the Treasury is better off at the end of the fiscal year than it was at the beginning disregarding entirely the proceeds of the Victory loan payments in September, 1919, except as they were used to retire Government securities and not to pay running expenses.

Remember that this Republican Congress, due to a fortunate filibuster in the United States Senate, was placed in charge of much of the appropriations for this fiscal year and reduced Democratic appropriations by $940,000,000, and this is the principal reason why the Treasury is $830,000,000 better off than at the beginning of the fiscal year, permitting all the proceeds of the Victory loan to be used in reducing our public debt instead of payment on running expenses.

This more favorable showing of the Treasury Department is due to two or three causes: First, reduction of expenditures by this Congress from previous Democratic bills of $940,000,000, as I have explained; second, the insistence of the Republican Congress upon greater activity in the salvage of Government property; and third, increase in the revenue from other sources above the estimates of about $450,000,000.

I think the country and the Republican Party should be congratulated on this wonderful showing in the first year after the war.

Now, looking at the fiscal year 1921, we find that the relation between estimated revenues and estimated expenditures furnished by the recognized actuaries of the Treasury Department are as follows:

Customs	$340,000,000
Income and profits taxes	3,200,000,000
Miscellaneous internal-revenue receipts	1,300,000,000
Public lands	1,000,000
Miscellaneous sources of revenue	640,000,000
Panama Canal tolls	8,000,000
Total estimated receipts, 1921	5,489,000,000

The foregoing tabulation excludes the postal receipts.

Against these receipts we have estimated expenditures as follows, excluding expenditures on account of the Postal Service, to be paid from the postal revenues, in which it is assumed there will be no deficiency:

Under annual appropriation measures	$1,753,340,897
Construction of roads	45,000,000
Permanent annual and indefinite appropriations	1,400,000,000
Redemption of war-saving certificates	100,000,000
$240 bonus	30,760,000
Deficiency estimates which may be submitted against 1921 revenues	50,000,000
Settlement of Army and Navy contracts	115,000,000
Railroads	600,000,000

Excess of receipts over expenditures, fiscal year 1921, $1,394,899,103.

In other words, the present revenues under the present system of taxation will leave the Treasury next year better off by about $1,394,000,000 than it was at the beginning.

To what is this good showing due? There is only one answer. The Republican Congress reduced expenditures below what was requested by the executive departments by about $1,400,000,000, which is just about the amount by which the revenues will exceed the expenditures.

This $1,394,000,000 excess may be applied on the floating debt of approximately $2,600,000,000, and thus reduce it by one-half, or it can be otherwise applied. At any rate, it is better to have it than not to have it, and we would not have had this excess of revenues had the Democratic Party instead of the Republican Party been in control of Congress.

I am not submitting this statement, Mr. Speaker, with any idea of encouraging any less regard for the most rigid economy than we have exercised or encouraging anyone to believe that taxes can be reduced until provision is made to take care of the floating debt of the Government. If taxes are to be reduced, then bonds must be sold to take up the floating debt, which even the great saving of $1,400,000,000 by the Republicans in the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress will not discharge.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RAKER,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 13931 is in substance the Capper-Hersman bill. I was in favor of that bill; and while there is a slight change made from the Capper-Hersman bill in the present bill, I shall and do support the present bill. I voted to consider the present bill, supported it in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and have just voted to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The object of this bill is to authorize the producers of agricultural products to form associations for the purpose of collectively preparing for market and marketing their products.

Section 1 defines and limits the kind of associations to which the legislation applies. These limitations are aimed to exclude from the benefits of this legislation all but actual farmers and all associations not operated for the mutual help of their members as such producers. Unless each member has but one vote in his association, irrespective of the amount he may have invested as capital therein, the association must not pay a dividend of to exceed 8 per cent per annum. This limitation of 8 per cent is designed to compel payment to the members of as large a part of the proceeds derived from the sale of their products as possible, instead of paying it as a dividend upon the money used as capital. A number of farm associations oppose the payment of any dividend on capital, while others insist that they need a capital and must have the privilege of paying dividends. Eight per cent was fixed for the reason that in many places money can not be borrowed at a less rate, and that hence a less rate would prevent some of these associations from obtaining the necessary funds to carry on their business. The aim has been to make the provisions of the bill sufficiently liberal so that all cooperative farm associations operated in good faith for the benefit of its members might avail themselves of the provisions of this bill. The bill does not, however, compel any association to change its present organization nor does it create any new organizations. Associations will continue to be formed under State laws as heretofore. In States where it is illegal to operate an association such as the ones permitted under this bill, it will, because of the nature of such associations, be practically impossible to operate under this legislation, as the bill only grants the right to operate in interstate and foreign commerce. That is the only power that Congress can confer upon such associations.

Section 2 makes applicable to these associations in a modified form the provisions of the Clayton Act. Briefly, it gives the Secretary of Agriculture power to prevent these associations from exploiting the public. In the event that any association should refuse to comply with the order of the Secretary, a suit may be brought in the appropriate district court to enforce his order. The farmers are not asking a chance to oppress the public, but insist that they should be given a fair opportunity to meet business conditions as they exist—a condition that is very unfair under the present law. Whenever a farmer seeks to sell his products he meets in the market place the representatives of vast aggregations of organized capital that largely determine the price of his products. Personally he has very little if anything to say about the price. If he seeks to associate himself with his neighbors for the purpose of collectively negotiating for a fair price, he is threatened with prosecution. Many of the corporations with which he is compelled to deal are each composed of from 30,000 to 40,000 members. These members collectively do business as one person. The officers of the corporation act as agents of these members. This bill, if it becomes a law, will allow farmers to form like associations, the officers of which will act as agents for their members.

While this bill confers on farmers certain privileges, it can not properly be said to be class legislation. Business corporations have under existing law all the powers and privileges sought to be conferred on farm organizations by this bill. Instead of granting a class privilege, it aims to equalize existing privileges by changing the law applicable to the ordinary business corporations so the farmers can take advantage of it. Instead of granting to farmers a special privilege, it aims to take from the business corporations a special privilege by conferring a like privilege on farm organizations. It is no answer that farmers may acquire the status and secure the rights of a business corporation by deeding their farms to a corporation. That is neither practical nor desirable from any standpoint. Without doing that they can not associate themselves together for the mutual profit of the members without being threatened with prosecution.

New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and a number of other States have granted the right to form associations such as those contemplated in this bill. But these States can not confer any right upon their organizations to engage in interstate or foreign commerce. This bill is designed to grant that right. Associations of this kind are common in European countries and have been in operation for many years. Their effect has not been to raise prices to the consumer. In many instances the effect has been the reverse. They have tended to prevent much of the gambling in foodstuffs and to eliminate many of the useless middlemen that stand between the producers, the retailers, and the consumers. It is one of the chief problems of these associations to reach the consumer with as little expense as possible. Farmers ought to be given a chance to do that. The high cost of living can not be solved by discouraging agriculture. It must be solved by fair treatment of those engaged in that pursuit. To maintain his self-respect and the dignity of his occupation the farmer must be given an opportunity to deal in selling his products on an equal footing with those who purchase it. He should be given an opportunity to help solve in a rational and fair way the problems involved in the high cost of living.

I have just received a telegram from the agricultural legislative committee of California vigorously indorsing this bill. That telegram reads as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CALIF., May 27, 1920.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
Representative Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Agricultural legislative committee of California, representing 70,000 farmers doing an annual business of over $2,000,000, to-day vigorously indorsed Volstead-Capper bill and unanimously passed the following statement of principle:

"Agriculture contributes so largely to the prosperity and well-being of the public that whatever makes for the legitimate interests of the producer brings a corresponding benefit to the public.

"Federal and State laws should be enacted permitting bona fide producers of agricultural products to act together either as corporations or otherwise in producing, manufacturing, storing, distributing, and selling their products. Whether producers' organization is formed with or without capital stock, has equal or unequal voting power of members, or pays interest or dividends on the capital employed are details that should be determined in each instance by the members of the organization, with due regard to the nature and extent of the industry itself and the necessities of production, storage, manufacture, and distribution.

"Any interest or dividends paid on capital, however, should be considered in the nature of a reasonable interest on the capital employed in furnishing the facilities through which the members transact their business. Such interest or dividends should not be considered as a profit earned by the capital contributed, but, rather, as a fair return to the members for the use of the capital which they contribute to furnish their own business facilities.

"The same public concern which authorizes collective organization and action by producers likewise requires provisions that safeguard the public against abuses by such collective action of producers and should provide the machinery for such public protection, preserving at all times to the producers the legitimate benefits of their cooperative efforts. It should be understood that the right to organize collectively under the laws referred to should be restricted to associations or organizations composed exclusively of producers of agricultural or horticultural products."

Legislative committee is composed of the following organizations: San Joaquin County Table Grape Growers' Association, California Fruit Exchange, California Fruit Growers' Exchange, California Peach Growers, California Fruit Distributors, Sebastopol Apple Growers' Union, California Prune and Apricot Growers' Association, California Pear Growers' Association, Mutual Orange Distributors, California Berry Growers' Association, Poultry Producers of Central California, California Lima Bean Growers' Association, California Cattlemen's Association, Associated Dairymen of California, Fruit Growers of California, California Almond Growers' Exchange, California Associated Raisin Company, California Walnut Growers, Nurserymen's Bud Selection Association, California Bean Growers' Association, Southern California Poultry Producers' Association.

Who Kept the Faith—Who Broke It?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT FERRIS,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 4, 1920.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, I have served in Congress from the State of Oklahoma for almost 14 years. The many bills I have introduced, votes I have cast, speeches made, are an open book. The citizens of my State and my colleagues are entitled to know the facts in reference to them. They have been compiled, and I have issued a statement to the people of Oklahoma embodying them. It follows:

To the people of Oklahoma:

You are entitled to know my attitude toward the war measures. Four million eight hundred thousand soldiers were serving at the front; America's taxpayers were buying Liberty bonds and paying income taxes that were heavy and hard to bear; 2,500,000 of America's womanhood were enlisting as nurses, yeowomen, and in other war activities; America's mothers were knitting sweaters and socks and praying and hoping that the war might be concluded. America's citizens, both within and without Congress, were expected to do their full part. You are entitled to know who kept the faith—who broke it.

WAR MEASURES ON WHICH TEST VOTES CAME.

1. War resolution. Every Democratic House member of the Oklahoma delegation present likewise supported this legislation.

2. Selective-draft law. Every Democratic House member of the Oklahoma delegation present likewise supported this legislation.

In the Senate, the Gore resolution, a duplicate of the McLemore resolution, which was killed in the Senate by an overwhelming vote.

4. Fifty-dollar bonus to dependent families. Every Democratic House member of the Oklahoma delegation present likewise supported this legislation.

5. Increase of soldiers' pay from $15 to $30 per month. Every Democratic House member of the Oklahoma delegation present voted for this amendment.

24. War-time prohibition. Every Democratic House member of the Oklahoma delegation present likewise supported this legislation.

Of the 96 Senators in the Senate there were but 8 who failed to keep the faith. Of the 435 Members of the House there were not exceeding 30 who from the beginning of the war to its close hindered and delayed their Government—obstructed war legislation, made troublesome speeches, introduced vicious bills, and cast unpatriotic votes. Fortunately most of these two groups have been defeated by patriotic constituencies, who repudiated them for the records made. Unfortunately for the country, a few remain.

This unfaithful group and those who agree with them on the subject are now vociferously asserting that they were the faithful ones and that those who did not agree with them, who would not vote as they voted, were the unfaithful. They are asserting that those who kept the faith are rubber stamps, inconsequential, and were lacking in vision, personality, and individual strength.

This willful group are now seeking to bolster up their record by asserting that they wear no ring in their nose, that they know no master, that they are men of vision, freethinkers, independent, and do not have to be led or follow any leader.

True, the 400 Congressmen and 90 Senators who were faithful to their oath of office, loyal in the support of the war, true to the Commander in Chief in raising an army, purchasing ships, killing McLemore resolutions and vicious amendments did not agree with this miserable slacker group. It is true that they helped to conduct the war—helped to raise an army, helped to equip an army, helped to furnish supplies, and helped to win the war.

Has the time come in America's history when the faithful of yesterday become the unfaithful of to-day? Has the time come when this willful group, hated, despised, and apologized for from one end of the country to the other, shall become the faithful and the chosen of to-day?

No; history has never written such a page—exacted such a toll.

Has the time come when sophistry, high-sounding phrases, skilled oratory, wit, sarcasm, and invective, bolstered up by fragments of truth amidst pages of deception, can blur the record of those who honored the Nation, upheld its tradition, and preserved the flag?

If this little group of 6 Senators was right, 90 Senators were wrong. If this little group of 24 Congressmen was right, 400 Congressmen were wrong. If this little group was right, Taft, Roosevelt, Root, the 48 governors of the 48 States, and the President of the United States were wrong. If this little group was right, Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln were wrong.

No; in truth and in fact, history must write, if it writes the truth, that this little group had forgotten their country, their patriotism, and their devotion to duty. It must write that they were catering to an element born beyond our shores. They were obstructing the progress of the war. Their bills, votes, and speeches did not ring true.

It has been asserted that the character of support I gave my Government during the war was that of a rubber stamp, but I can not believe that would be the verdict of more than the few. The eight Congressmen from Oklahoma have voted as I have voted, spoke as I have spoken, have stood as I have stood—behind the Government—aiding and helping the Government as best they could from the beginning of the war to its close. To say I am a rubber stamp is to say they, too, were rubber stamps.

To say that the eight Congressmen from Oklahoma, who stood by their President, their Government, the boys at the front, the war legislation, the necessary appropriations to feed, clothe, and support the Army, are rubber stamps is to attack men who faithfully performed their duty when their Government called.

To say that the eight Oklahoma Congressmen who kept the faith are rubber stamps is but to repeat in substance the words of Trotski and Lenin, in far-away Russia, while they were stabbing their country in the heart with Bolshevism, anarchism, and disloyalty.

To say that the eight members of the Oklahoma delegation in Congress who voted alike on every vote, who spoke alike in every speech, who were helpful, thoughtful, and mindful of their Government's interests at every step of the perilous way throughout the war were rubber stamps is to adopt in substance the words of Villa, who is to-day disrupting Mexico as a common outlaw, a dangerous bandit, an enemy to society, a traitor to his country.

Fortunately in Oklahoma 77 counties have held county conventions, and not a single one of the 77 counties failed to indorse in terms specific the record of the Democratic House members of the Oklahoma congressional delegation for their services rendered throughout the war.

Fortunately a great State-wide convention was recently held in Muskogee, Okla., represented by more than a thousand delegates from every one of the 77 counties in the State, who in words unmistakable, in words loud and clear, passed a resolution easy to understand, plain in terms, emphatic in spirit. That great convention which passed this resolution without a single dissenting vote seemed to understand who was faithful, who was unfaithful, who had kept the faith, who had broken it. The resolution follows:

Not unmindful of her illustrious dead the Democracy of Oklahoma venerates the name of the Hon. Joe B. Thompson whose fidelity to his constituency went hand in hand with his enlarged conception of the true patriot. His ideal was performance of duty, his recreation was found in faithful service.

Resolved, That we most heartily commend the Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN, SCOTT FERRIS, W. W. HASTINGS, J. V. MCCLINTIC, CHARLES D. CARTER, E. B. HOWARD, and TOM MCKEOWN for their able, patriotic, and zealous support of and full accord with President Wilson as Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy in the conduct of the war and their zealous support since the signing of the armistice in endeavoring to bring the world lasting and eternal peace through the League of Nations. We condemn as un-Democratic, unpatriotic, and un-American the action of those who during the progress of the war obstructed and delayed and did what they could to retard and impede the war program, and who, since the armistice, have been seeking to pervert the results of victory, prevent the adoption of the peace treaty, and destroy the covenant of the League of Nations. The Democracy of Oklahoma with the blush of shame and the lament of sorrow deplores the action of its other Senator in pursuing a policy of obstruction and in giving aid and comfort to alien enemies from the inception of the war even unto the present hour, and the Democracy of Oklahoma most solemnly avows never to support any candidate, whomsoever, who during the war was under suspicion of disloyalty to our country's cause.

VICIOUS SENATE AMENDMENTS WHICH OBSTRUCTED, HINDERED, AND DELAYED THE PROGRESS OF THE WAR.

La Follette substitute, which reads as follows:

That within 15 days after this act takes effect the following question shall be submitted to the voters: "The Government of the United States having declared war against the Government of Germany, shall the United States Government at this time raise an army by draft to send to Europe to prosecute the war?"

Substitute defeated May 1, 1917, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, page 1624 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—yeas 4, nays 68. The yeas were GORE, GRONNA, LA FOLLETTE, and Vardaman.

McCumber amendment: Senator MCCUMBER moved to strike out the provision exempting conscientious objectors May 1, 1917, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, page 1625 of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—yeas 17, nays 54. GORE, Hardwick, and PENROSE were among those absent.

McKellar amendment: Providing for raising of an army by volunteers rather than by draft. Defeated in Senate April 28, 1917, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, page 1489—yeas 18, nays 69. GORE, Hardwick, and Vardaman all voted yes.

GORE'S amendment to revenue bill:

That until Congress otherwise provides, no part of the moneys raised or received under the authority of this act or otherwise shall be accepted, expended, or used, either directly or indirectly, to transport over the seas any citizen of the United States drafted into the military service thereof, unless such citizen shall also have volunteered for such service over the seas. (65th Cong., 1st sess., Aug. 18, 1917, p. 6146.)

The war revenue bill was pending. It was for the purpose of raising funds to feed, clothe, and equip the Army, to further conduct the war, to buy ships, to transport troops, to maintain the honor of the Republic, to win the war.

This amendment would have obstructed the war, delayed the transportation of troops, and released every slacker and conscientious objector and disloyal person who desired to avoid service. This in the midst of the world's greatest war.

SMOOT'S amendment to buy whisky:

Provided, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, directed to take over for and on behalf of the Government of the United States all distilled liquors that are held in bond at the time this act goes into effect, and he is hereby authorized to pay the owners of such liquors the actual cost of the same plus a profit of not exceeding 10 per cent.

Amendment adopted July 7, 1917, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, page 4780—yeas 65, nays 12. OWEN voted against it; GORE voted for it. This amendment would have cost America's taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars. It was later stricken from the bill. It would have taken money from the Treasury and sent it straight to the distillers of the East, thereby impoverishing the West and the entire Republic. It would have increased our war debt and required greater sacrifices of our people.

VOTED FOR SOLDIERS' SALARY INCREASE.

You are entitled to know my position and attitude toward the increase of the soldiers' salary from $15 to $30 a month. The salary increase from $15 to $30 a month was an amendment offered by Austin, of Tennessee. I voted for it, as did every Member of the House present—there wasn't a single dissenting vote. (See dates, volumes, pages where votes were had on this important question.)

Austin amendment, April 28, 1917, page 1550—yeas 257, nays none. No roll call.

Final passage of bill April 28, 1917, page 1557—yeas 397, nays 24. SCOTT FERRIS voted "Yes."

Motion to recommit May 16, 1917, pages 2396-97—yeas 199, nays 178. SCOTT FERRIS voted "Yes." Also GILLETTE, MANN, KAHN, LONGWORTH, STEDMAN, Fitzgerald, Adamson, and every member of Military Affairs Committee. They were unwilling to allow the organization of an army to be delayed. The salary item as reduced by the Senate was $25 a month plus 20 per cent, which amounted to $30, to those who served abroad, and if that was not sufficient, it could be increased any day. No one was against the salary increase; everyone had voted for it—it was a controversy over recommitting the entire draft bill. To say that these men were against the increase of salary is preposterous. It simply is not true.

Final adoption of conference report May 16, 1917, page 2423, without roll call. SCOTT FERRIS voted "Yes."

Speaker CHAMP CLARK of Missouri, who was Speaker all through the war, who understands the proceedings in Congress and knows the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and every detail of it as no other man does, gives the true situation with reference to the soldiers' increase, citing the page of the RECORD and all the details about it in a letter to Ray O. Weems, of Sallisaw, Okla., showing conclusively that SCOTT FERRIS not only voted for the increase but helped the soldier and stood for the soldiers' interest on every occasion. The letter is as follows:

APRIL 29, 1920.

Mr. RAY O. WEEMS,
Sallisaw, Okla.

DEAR MR. WEEMS: I have received your letter of recent date making inquiry as to what took place in Congress at the time the soldier salary increase was up for consideration. I also observe your desire to know what part Congressman SCOTT FERRIS took on that particular matter and also what his general attitude has been toward the soldiers.

In reply, I beg to advise you that I was Speaker of the House of Representatives when this controversy came up and that while my memory on the subject is fairly clear, I have had the RECORD examined in order that there might be no mistake about it.

The whole question of the increase of pay of the soldiers was carried in H. R. 3545, the so-called draft bill, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session.

First vote. Mr. Austin of Tennessee offered an amendment to the draft bill increasing the soldiers' pay from $15 to $30 a month. Yeas 257, nays none. SCOTT FERRIS was present and voted yes. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Apr. 28, 1917, p. 1550, 65th Cong., 1st sess.)

Second vote. Final passage of the draft bill containing the Austin amendment. Yeas 397, nays 24. SCOTT FERRIS voted yes. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Apr. 28, 1917, 65th Cong., 1st sess.)

Third vote. The Senate reduced the pay of soldiers to $29 a month, thereby placing the item in conference. The draft bill, in form of a conference report, came from the House carrying an amendment increasing the soldiers' pay to $25 a month, plus 20 per cent for foreign service, which made it $30 a month. The conference report amount carried $30 a month for all who served abroad—the same as finally passed. The difference between $25 a month, provided in the conference report for those that remained at home, could be remedied any day—the 178 men who voted against recommitment were the best men in the House and all true friends to the soldiers. Mr. GOOD, of Iowa, moved to recommit the entire draft bill with instructions to increase the soldiers' pay to $30 a month. Yeas, 199; nays, 178. See pages 2396-2397 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-fifth Congress.

The 178 Members who voted against recommitment were not opposed to the salary item—they were opposed to recommitment of the draft bill and delaying the organization of an army. For example, every member of the Military Affairs Committee, both Republican and Democrat, voted against recommitting the bill. The present Speaker, FREDERICK H. GILLETT; Republican leader, JAMES R. MANN; ranking Republican member of the Military Affairs Committee, KAHN; NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, son-in-law of the late lamented Roosevelt; Maj. STEDMAN, an old Confederate soldier; Fitzgerald, of New York, chairman of the Appropriations Committee; Adamson, of Georgia, chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee; FERRIS, chairman of the congressional committee; and each and every one of the 178 Members who voted against the recommitment of the draft bill and sending it back to conference had previously voted in favor of the increase of salary—for the Austin amendment—for the draft law carrying the Austin amendment, and to say that they were opposed to the increase of salary is preposterous—without reason and without justice. It simply is not true; not a Republican or Democrat in the House was opposed to the increase.

Fourth vote. Final adoption of the conference report carrying $30 a month pay for soldiers. Passed without a roll call; no Member voted no. SCOTT FERRIS was present and voted yes. President Wilson signed it, and it became a law. The soldiers received $30 a month throughout the war.

In the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, in the consideration of the volunteer enlistment bill, S. 5279, Mr. Decker, of Missouri, offered an amendment giving the soldiers $30 a month in time of peace as well as in war. It was adopted unanimously. SCOTT FERRIS was present and voted for it; it was signed by the President; it is a law. Soldiers of the Army now receive $30 a month.

In addition to what the record shows and in addition to the facts as above given, I desire to say that SCOTT FERRIS's attitude toward the soldiers, from the beginning of the war to this good day, has been of the most friendly sort. He has not only voted for the increases of the soldiers' pay on each and every occasion, but has supported and voted for every appropriation for supplies for the soldiers and for every piece of legislation that would help the soldiers. He did not stop there. Throughout the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, while he was chairman of the Public Lands Committee, he tried faithfully to secure the passage of legislation that would allow the soldiers to buy homes on long time of repayment at low rates of interest. He appealed to me as Speaker to help get it through. He brought it up in the congressional committee of which he is chairman and fought to get their indorsement of it. He did every conceivable thing to get legislation through for the soldiers, and he still is at it. He is at this time absenting himself from his campaign and remaining here in Washington trying to help get through the American Legion bill and achieve something for the soldiers. The soldiers have no better friend in Congress than SCOTT FERRIS.

Very truly, yours, CHAMP CLARK.

VOTED TO SPECIFICALLY INCLUDE MEMBERS OF CONGRESS IN DRAFT—REGISTERED AND CLAIMED NO EXEMPTION.

You are entitled to know my position on the question of exempting Congressmen from service during the war. I voted twice to specifically include Members of Congress in the draft. I registered and claimed no exemptions, and had they called men up to 41 years of age I would have been called as every other man was called. It will be remembered that men above 36 years of age were never called.

Hon. South Trimble, of Kentucky, was Clerk of the House throughout the war and when this question was voted upon, has, pursuant to a request from Mr. Glover Suter, an ex-soldier of Randlett, Okla., written a letter which gives the facts precisely as they are. He has no interest in this contest. His letter explains the entire situation:

APRIL 28, 1920.

Mr. GLOVER SUTER,
Randlett, Okla.

MY DEAR GLOVER: I have received your letter of recent date. I was Clerk of the House during the war Congress. I knew SCOTT FERRIS very well. I was present when both the draft bills were passed through the House. When the first draft law was passed it included men between the ages of 21 and 31, and there was no Member of the House or Senate who fell within those ages. Hence the first draft law had no application whatever to Congressmen and Senators.

Later in the Congress, as the war progressed, it was necessary to have additional men, and the War Department prepared a new bill, which was known as the second draft bill, and which provided for the drafting of men from 18 to 45 years of age. While this bill was being considered in the House, Mr. Gregg, of Texas, offered an amendment to specifically include Members of Congress in the draft. The first vote on the question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. SCOTT FERRIS was present and voted for it. The amendment and the vote on it will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 23, 1918, page 9458.

Later, during the consideration of the bill, Mr. SIMS, of Tennessee, demanded a second vote on the proposition of specifically including Members of Congress. Mr. SIMS, a gentleman 66 years old at the time, could not have had any special interest in it, and contended that it was an unwise policy to draft Members of Congress and thereby hinder the work of the war Congress. The second vote was taken. Eighty-nine Members voted specifically to include Congressmen in the draft; 143 followed Mr. SIMS, and the amendment was defeated. SCOTT FERRIS was present, and was one of the 89 who a second time voted specifically to include Members of Congress in the draft. You will find the second vote in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 24, 1918, at page 9505.

Immediately following the passage of the second draft law, including men between 18 and 45, SCOTT FERRIS, being 41 years of age and within the limit, immediately registered, as did every one of the 25,000,000 registrants, claimed no exemption, and stood ready to go. The war was concluded by the signing of the armistice in November, 1918, and men above the age of 36 and below the age of 21 were never called.

You can say to the Oklahoma people for me that the American soldier had no better friend in Congress than SCOTT FERRIS. He not only voted for every increase and against every decrease but spoke in their behalf, worked in their behalf, and is now in Washington working in behalf of bonus legislation and every other species of legislation which is good for the American soldiers.

SCOTT FERRIS was a loyal, patriotic Member of Congress throughout the war. He was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands in the House of Representatives. He was likewise chairman of the Democratic congressional campaign committee. Notwithstanding this, and notwithstanding the sacrifice which would have been made had he left his seat in Congress and entered the service, he voted to include himself in the draft; when he was outvoted in that, he registered, claimed no exemption, and stood ready to go, as did every other man.

Oklahomans do not and will not have occasion to apologize for SCOTT FERRIS's war record. He was 100 per cent every day.

Remember me to your father.

Very truly, yours, SOUTH TRIMBLE.

SUPPORTED WOMAN SUFFRAGE ON EVERY VOTE.

You are entitled to know my position and to have the complete record on the question of woman suffrage. It is as follows:

First vote in the House: House joint resolution 1—yeas 174, nays 204. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Jan. 12, 1915, 63d Cong., 3d sess., pp. 1483–1484.)

Thus it will be observed that I voted for suffrage when it was unpopular as well as later when it was popular.

First vote in Senate on suffrage: Senate joint resolution 1—yeas 35, nays 34. Senator GORE voted no. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Mar. 19, 1914, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 5108).

Second vote in the House on suffrage: House joint resolution 200—Yeas 274, nays 136. I voted yes. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Jan. 10, 1918, 65th Cong., 2d sess., p. 810.)

Second Senate vote: House joint resolution 200—yeas 53, nays 31. GORE voted yes. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Oct. 1, 1918, 65th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 10987–10988.)

Third vote in the Senate on suffrage: House joint resolution 200—yeas 55, nays 29. GORE voted yes. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 10, 1919, 65th Cong., 3d sess., p. 3062.)

Third vote in the House: House joint resolution 1—yeas 304, nays 90. I voted yes. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 21, 1919, 66th Cong., 1st sess., p. 93.)

Fourth vote in the Senate on suffrage: House joint resolution 1—yeas 56, nays 25. GORE absent and not voting. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 4, 1919, 66th Cong., 1st sess., p. 635.)

I voted for woman suffrage when it was an issue in the State; I voted for woman suffrage when it was an issue in the Nation; I have never voted against suffrage; I have always supported it. I have received a letter from Carrie Chapman Catt, one of the leaders of the suffrage movement, thanking me for my efforts in behalf of suffrage. The letter follows:

NATIONAL AMERICAN WOMAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1919.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FERRIS: In behalf of our association, we write to thank you once more, not only for your support of the suffrage amendment on May 21, but for your genuine and most helpful interest in the long, hard months that preceded that splendid victory.

It is a pleasure to thank all our friends, but we take special satisfaction in expressing our gratitude to those who, like yourself, have at all times been loyal defenders of our great cause.

Sincerely, yours,

CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT,
President.
ANNA HOWARD SHAW,
Honorary President.
HELEN H. GARDENER,
Fifth Vice President.
MAUD WOOD PARK,
Chairman Congressional Committee.

SUPPORTED JUST LABOR LEGISLATION.

You are entitled to know my position with reference to the labor questions that have come up in Congress during my service here. I have supported and helped secure the passage of the following bills. They were in the interest of labor—they were labor's demands:

Bill forbidding child labor in the District of Columbia.

Amendment forbidding prosecution of labor organizations under antitrust law. A law asked by labor.

Children's Bureau, to improve the conditions of America's children.

Direct election of United States Senators instead of by State legislatures as in past.

Forbidding transportation of prison-made goods, protecting labor against competition with convict labor.

Child labor bill, to protect the children against being placed in sweatshops.

Minimum wage for Federal employees, insuring employees of living wage and principle for which labor has long contended.

Anti-injuction bill, to protect labor.

Federal employees workmen's compensation act, to provide compensation for Federal employees injured in line of duty.

Final passage of postal employees' salary increase, to give postal employees living wage.

Employers' liability, to protect workers and preserve their rights in personal injuries.

Motion to override President Taft's veto of bill containing exemption of labor from prosecution under antitrust law.

Sundry civil bill making appropriations for vocational rehabilitation, a bill to help soldiers wounded in war.

I have always been friendly to the 20,000,000 wage earners of the country. The American Federation of Labor keeps a complete record and a complete check on every Member of Congress, every bill introduced, every vote cast, every speech made. Hon. Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, has been good enough to write a letter which, I think, quite well states my attitude toward labor and labor questions. It follows:

APRIL 12, 1920.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I am sending your labor record made as a Member of Congress from 1908 to the present time. I am doing this with a great deal of pleasure, as your record is a very favorable one.

As you know, labor does not ask for anything that is not of benefit to all the people. Therefore, when we find a Member of Congress who is loyal to the people because of his loyalty to labor, we consider it a duty to express our satisfaction to him personally.

The nonpartisan political campaign of the American Federation of Labor, which is now in full swing throughout the country, has for its purpose the return to Congress of such men as you and the defeating of those who continually, by both word and vote, take away the liberties of the people.

Again congratulating you on the good record you have made as a Member of Congress, I remain,

Yours, truly,

FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor.

I ask my friends to examine the bills introduced, the speeches made, the votes cast, the results attained, to determine who served them best, and who was faithful to them. I ask them to read carefully the letter of the American Federation of Labor, signed by Frank Morrison, its secretary, who has kept the record, knows the facts, and states the truth.

SUPPORTED LEGISLATION BENEFICIAL TO RURAL CARRIERS AND OTHER GOVERNMENT CLERKS.

You are entitled to know my attitude toward the 650,000 civil-service employees in the United States and their salaries and their general welfare. I have at all times been friendly to them and their interests. Hon. Luther C. Steward, president of the National Federation of Federal Employees, keeps an accurate record of every Member of Congress, his votes, his speeches, and his bills, and he, better than anyone else, knows the attitude that I have maintained throughout my long service here toward these 650,000 civil-service employees. He has been good enough to write a letter on the subject, explaining the situation. It follows:

APRIL 16, 1920.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your letter of the 14th instant asking that I examine the record maintained by the National Federation of Federal Employees as to important votes cast by each Congressman and Senator affecting the interests of labor in general and the Federal employees in particular, and inform you whether or not your record has been favorable on these questions. You also ask that I particularly inform you as to our record of your stand on the so-called Borland amendment and Nolan minimum-wage bill, two measures of particular importance to Federal employees throughout the United States.

In reply I take pleasure in informing you that the attitude of the Federal employees, as expressed through their organization, the National Federation of Federal Employees, has been of the utmost friendliness toward you, due to the feeling that you were interested in their welfare and would deal with an open mind and in a fair spirit in respect to measures in which they were interested. Our records show that on important measures affecting either the interest of labor or Federal employees you have been recorded as favorable; that you are recorded in opposition to the Borland amendment, which piece of legislation would have resulted in adding about 15 per cent to the working day of Federal employees, without any corresponding increase in compensation; you are recorded as opposing the Good amendment to the Nolan minimum-wage bill, which amendment, had it been adopted, would have deprived beneficiaries of the minimum-wage bill of any benefit from a temporary increase, or so-called bonus. You are also recorded as voting for the Nolan minimum-wage bill on its final passage. This measure, affecting as it does about 66,000 of the lowest-paid Federal employees, now receiving less than a living wage, is one of our most important measures.

I can only wish that all of the Members of the House had records as favorable toward remedial legislation for Federal employees as yourself. In that event, the condition of civilian employees would be materially above what it is at the present time.

Very truly, yours,

LUTHER C. STEWARD, President.

SUPPORTED LEGISLATION BENEFICIAL TO FARMERS.

You are entitled to know my attitude toward the 6,500,000 American farmers. From the day I entered Congress until this good day I have never introduced a single bill against the farmer's interests, never have spoken against his interests, never have failed to speak in his behalf when his interests were hanging in the balance. I have never voted against the farmer's interests; neither have I failed to cast a vote in his behalf when opportunity presented itself.

SOME OF THE MORE IMPORTANT PIECES OF FARM LEGISLATION THAT I HAVE HELPED TO ENACT.

1. Federal aid for good roads, under which $294,000,000 have been appropriated out of the Federal Treasury.

2. Law to prevent gambling in farm products, affording the farmer an open and honest market on which to sell the products of the farm.

3. Rural credits law, lowering the rates of interest, longer tenure, affording the farmer who earns slowly an opportunity to repay on.

4. Warehouse bill, enabling the farmer to house his crops and prevent him from sacrificing them on an unfavorable market.

5. Ferris 640-acre homestead law, increasing the area of homesteads that may be homesteaded from 160 to 640 acres.

6. Three-year homestead law, cutting down the residence requirement from five to three years.

7. Ship-purchase act, freeing America's farmers from the shipping trust; furnishing them an avenue and market for their crops; ships to carry America's commerce; enabling the farmer to have a steady and dependable market for his wheat, cotton, and his every product.

8. Marine-insurance law, requiring the Government to afford insurance to America's producers in order that their products may go forward across the sea to an open market.

It will be remembered that before this law was enacted, during the early part of the war, cotton dropped down to 6 cents a pound and wheat to 79 cents a bushel. The marine-insurance law and the ship-purchase act brought the price of cotton and wheat up, by enabling him to send his products in Government ships under Government insurance across the sea to the markets of the world, thereby aiding him in his efforts to succeed.

9. Bureau of Markets, a Federal bureau supported by the Government, to aid the farmer in securing the best market for his crops; to help him avoid waste; to provide better market facilities; and to assist the farmer in every way.

10. Bureau of Good Roads, to keep alive road improvement everywhere, to cooperate with the States in a great system of Federal highways.

11. Food-control bill, a war measure, necessary during the war to provide sufficient food for our armies at the front. To prevent waste, profiteering, and graft.

The vote was taken on the conference report on the food-control bill, it being the last vote before the bill went to the President for his signature—yeas 359, nays none. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 65th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 5767–5768.)

Not a single Republican or Democrat failed to support this bill. It was the best judgment of everyone present at the time. Every Democratic Member of the Oklahoma delegation present voted "Yes."

Vote on the food-control bill in the Senate—yeas 81, nays 6. Senator OWEN voted "yes." GORE did not vote.

If certain phases of this bill worked a hardship and proved to be a mistake, it was a mistake of every Member of Congress in the House.

12. Wheat guaranty law; $2.50 wheat amendment—yeas 127, nays 180. I voted "yes." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Apr. 18, 1918, 65th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 5319–5320.)

Second vote in House, on $2.40 wheat amendment—yeas 150, nays 107. I voted "yes." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 6, 1918, 65th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 8796–8797.)

Third vote in House, on $2.40 wheat amendment; vote to override the President's veto—yeas 73, nays 173. I voted "Yes" to override the President's veto. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 65th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 9105–9106.)

Billion-dollar wheat guaranty—yeas 278, nays 14. I voted "yes" for the guaranty and to protect the farmer and his interests. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 22, 1919, 65th Cong., 3d sess., pp. 4051–4052.)

NOTE.—Thus it will be observed that on all four test votes on the wheat-guaranty proposition—increasing the price, overriding the President's veto, and so forth—I supported the farmers' interests on every vote.

Hon. A. F. Lever, 20 years a Member of Congress, 6 years chairman of the Agricultural Committee, now member of the Federal Farm Loan Board, who better than anyone else knows my attitude on agricultural questions, has been good enough to write me a letter on the subject, which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FEDERAL FARM LOAN BUREAU,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1920.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SCOTT: I am just in receipt of your letter, and because of the fact that I was six years chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture I am not surprised that you should make inquiry of me concerning your attitude in Congress touching matters of interest to agriculture in general.

You were always active and helpful in the passage of every measure considered in behalf of agriculture. This is especially true with respect to the farm-loan act, the cotton-futures act, the warehouse act, and the grain-grades act, the good-roads act, and the acts authorizing the construction of fertilizer plants and the establishment of the Bureau of Markets. These were measures with which I myself was intimately connected. I remember very distinctly also your position with reference to the $2.50 wheat bill and the billion-dollar wheat guaranty act. Not only did you vote for the $2.50 wheat bill, as well as the $2.40 wheat bill, which later passed both the House and Senate, and was vetoed by the President, but you likewise voted to override the veto of the President.

During the 14 years of service with you in the House I found you at all times not only alive to all legislation under consideration but especially alive to legislation reported from the Agricultural Committee which undertook to better the condition of agriculture throughout the Nation.

Very truly, yours,

A. F. LEVER,
Member Farm Loan Board.

I was born on a farm, raised on a farm, came of a race of farmers. Everything I have on earth is invested in a farm. I am interested in the farmers' welfare. I have supported them in season and out, as my record will disclose. True, I have not boasted that "I carried the farmers' votes in my vest pocket." True, I have not boasted that "the boys from the forks of the creek all belong to me." True, I have not agitated and sought to array them against other classes of citizens, for by so doing I become the farmer's enemy rather than his friend. Coming from a race of farmers as I do, I have preferred to believe that the farmer neither desires nor deserves flattery, cajolery, or deception practiced upon him. I have preferred to believe that he only asks a square deal, honest treatment, and a fair chance. This I have always accorded him. This I always will accord him. This I will fight to secure for him. I am perfectly sure he asks nothing more; and anyone who promises more is promising something that will not be delivered, something that can not come true, and merely seeking to presume upon his intelligence, which I can not do and will not do.

I have represented an agricultural district in Congress for 14 years. They have stood by me every day. I have intended to stand by them every day as I understood their rights and desires. To have done less then, to now promise to do more, would be an injustice to the farmers, an injustice to the public, would render me both unworthy and untrue.

I resent the insinuation that any Senator or Congressman carries in his vest pocket the votes of the Oklahoma farmers. They study, think, understand, and differ as we all differ. Because one farmer or little group of farmers are disloyal it does not follow that others are disloyal. Because one business man or group of business men, one laborer or group of laborers, are disloyal it does not follow that they are all disloyal. I deny that there is more disloyalty among the farmers than in any other class. I deny that they as a body will support a disloyal man when every other class refuses to accord him its support.

The burdens of the war have been heavy and hard to bear. The farmer has carried his load manfully and well. He is entitled to the thanks of a grateful Republic. It is true that injustices have been heaped upon the farmer in the administration of the food-control law. I am now at work seeking to correct some of them. I shall not stop until it is done.

SOME ACTS OF INFIDELITY AND DISLOYALTY TO MY GOVERNMENT THAT I DID NOT COMMIT.

1. I did not introduce troublesome bills to hinder and delay the progress of the war.

2. I did not introduce troublesome amendments tying up appropriation bills while the armies suffered for food, clothing, and equipment.

3. I did not introduce any McLemore resolutions to surrender my Government's rights and humiliate the Nation in which I lived.

4. I did not write letters of encouragement to slackers, draft resisters, draft dodgers, and other enemies of the Government.

5. I did not refuse to help raise an army when my Government was without an army, when my Government needed an army, when it was calling to Congress to raise an army.

6. I did not receive letters from an outraged constituency demanding that I resign, come home, on account of my lack of patriotism and infidelity to my country during the war.

7. I did not join hands with a little group of slackers, numbering approximately 8 in the Senate and some 24 in the House, and from the beginning of the war to its close hinder, delay, annoy, obstruct, scold, decry, and abuse my Government.

8. I did not refer to the soldiers as "conscripted slackers" and use other unpatriotic epithets of or concerning them.

9. I did not make a speech against the soldiers' increase of salary and call the soldiers sunshine patriots, knights of the drawing room, mollycoddles, who must carry with them chiropodists and manicurists to attend them on their mission.

10. I did not forsake my President, my party, my country, my Congress, in its hour of travail, by reason of pique, prejudice, and hatred for my Government and its Commander in Chief.

11. I did not join hands with a Republican Senate and help to defeat and kill the peace treaty, which contains provisions (a) for arbitration, (b) for reduction of armament, (c) for abolition of secret treaties, (d) the ending of the war.

12. I did not seek to array one class against another. I did not tell the farmers on the western side of the State that I was the only friend the farmers had, although by speech, bill, and vote I had supported them on every occasion; I did not tell the oil men on the eastern side of the State that I was the only friend the oil men had, although I had supported the depletion amendments and every just law in behalf of the oil industry and have received the acknowledgement of Chairman KITCHIN, who had authority to accept or reject them. I have preferred to believe that just laws for all were correct in principle, and that is all a just constituency would desire or require.

VIEWS ON RECONSTRUCTION LEGISLATION.

You are entitled to know my position on reconstruction legislation to enable us to get back to normal prewar conditions.

1. I am in favor of the immediate closing of the war by treaty stipulation, preserving America's rights and securing a lasting peace.

2. I am in favor of the immediate repeal of the irksome war laws that have outlived their usefulness.

3. I am in favor of soldiers' relief legislation along the line of the American Legion bill, feeling that the home-ownership provision will be of marked benefit to the soldiers and to the country. I can not get the consent of my mind to draft soldiers, cause them to make untold sacrifices, and then fail to do what other countries are doing and give substantial recognition to them.

4. I am in favor of an immediate modification of the burdensome tax laws and let the war debt be spread over a period of years as distinguished from being paid all in a few years, causing hardship, interference with business, and increasing the cost of living.

5. I am in favor of Federal aid to good roads and the expenditure of large sums to enable us to repopulate the farms and thereby lower the cost of living. Good roads benefit all—all should aid in their upbuilding.

6. I am in favor of additional and adequate marketing facilities so the farmer will not have to sacrifice his crops on poor markets when aid would save him and keep him on the farm.

7. I am in favor of stamping out gambling in farm products, so the farmer can have an open and an honest market on which to sell the products of the farm.

8. I have been true to the farmer and his legislation every step of the way. I will continue to do what I can to help the farmer. He is the backbone of the country and the country's prosperity. Without him the Nation perishes; with him it prospers and improves. The speeches made, bills introduced, votes cast in his behalf are all available. The record is made. I stand on it.

9. Increased personal credits to the farmers. The farmer is entitled to better interest rates, better borrowing facilities. The money market is already beginning to tighten up and this will hit the farmer first. This must be remedied and the farmer kept on the farm.

10. Labor must be treated fairly. The high cost of living everywhere present has made it necessary for them to ask some changes in their schedule of wages. The man who arrays labor against capital or capital against labor is the enemy of both. Each must be considerate of the other.

11. I have been true to labor and their every cause, and the American Federation of Labor, which has faithfully kept the record, in terms loud and clear so certifies. I will keep it again. The handful of disloyal and unpatriotic men in labor circles shall not submerge labor and labor's cause.

12. I am in favor of upholding the prohibition law. I am not a crank on the subject, but a nation dry is better than a nation wet—a nation sober is better than a nation drunk.

13. I am in favor of equal suffrage to men and women. They both pay taxes, they both serve the Nation in peace and war. They are entitled to equal consideration and equal rights. Those who do not desire it can let it alone. It is not compulsory suffrage, it merely affords the right.

14. I am not in favor of reducing the volume of money and bringing on another panic for the benefit of the financiers, who alone would profit, to the grief and distress of all the rest of us. To do this will ruin the man in debt and but multiply the millions of the money-changer.

15. I am not in favor of compulsory military training in time of peace. Give the citizen the largest latitude and the least restraint. That will serve both the citizen and the Nation best.

16. I am in favor of America first, last, and all the time. I supported her every cause before when we were at war. I had no divided allegiance. In the event of war again I would pursue the same course, hoping and praying always that the war clouds may never again appear. When the country is in peril the place for every citizen to be is behind his country.

17. I did not in the last war feel too big to stand by my country and its cause. I will not feel too big in the future, either in peace or in war. In time of war we can not all be commanders in chief. Some must lead, some must follow. The Constitution determines who shall lead in time of war, as it makes the President Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

18. I did not feel bigger than my party and join a little band of willful men who spent their time in picking flaws, finding fault, throwing stumps in the way. If I am expected to do that in the future, I pass.

19. I felt that during the war the 4,500,000 men in the Army, the taxpayers at home, the 2,500,000 women who were doing war work of one sort or another were entitled to some recognition, some support, and some rights. I may have been wrong about it, but it was my course; the record is made; the page is written. I stand on it as made and written.

20. I am in favor of rigid economy in Government expenditures—the disposing of all unnecessary Government employees in Washington, now that the war is over.

I hope I may be pardoned for a personal word; I have lived in the State 20 years—served the State in Congress almost 14 years—every living member of my family lives in Oklahoma. Everything I have on earth is in Oklahoma—my parents are buried there—my interests are there. Every tie that tugs at the human heart draws me to the State.

The speeches I have made, the bills introduced, the votes cast, the life I have lived, the things I have achieved, the faith I have kept, the loyalty displayed both in peace and war—the record is made, the record kept, the page is written. On this I stand. It is an open book. It is for your inspection. On it I am entitled to be judged; on it I stand or fall.

Some of the Things Zeke Candler Has Done During His Faithful Service in Congress.

SPEECH

OF

HON. EZEKIEL S. CANDLER,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, May 5, 1920.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] is recognized.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire first to thank my very good friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] for his generosity in yielding to me unlimited time. [Applause.] I desire also to express my sincere appreciation to you, my good friends, both Democrats and Republicans, for your kindnesses always extended to me and for frequently greeting me with applause when I rise to speak, thus assuring me of your confidence and esteem. I have long been a Member of this great legislative body, the House of Representatives of the United States, and to have enjoyed during all these years, and to enjoy to-day, your good will, your friendship, your confidence, and your esteem evidenced by your readiness attentively to hear me whenever I rise to speak fills my heart with affection for you and gratitude to you which increases with my daily associations with you as the years come and go. [Applause.]

You greatly honor me, and in honoring me you honor the noble, big-hearted, brave, chivalrous, and patriotic Mississippians who have been so good to me in giving to me every two years their approval at the ballot box, thereby retaining me in their service as their Representative. Because of their supreme kindness to me it delights me and ever makes me happy to be their servant, and the God whom I love and worship knows it is my earnest desire and purpose to promptly, faithfully, efficiently, and truly represent their views and express their sentiments, and do that at all times which will be for their very best interest, their welfare, and their prosperity. With humility of spirit and a contrite heart, I pray to Him above to help me at all times to do my full duty, and in doing so that I may always benefit the splendid people—men and women—whom I represent and for whom I vote and speak on this floor in this historic Capitol Building.

May I never by word or deed, by voice or vote, do anything hurtful or injurious to them. That is my conception of a true Representative—service—faithful, conscientious service, in the fear of God and for the good of the people. [Applause.] Sincerely entertaining these views, I have earnestly labored to be useful to my constituents in every way possible. I have sought to comply with every request for service which has come to me. I have answered promptly letters received from men, women, and children in my district, and whether matters mentioned by them were great or small, important or unimportant, whether they came from rich or poor, each and all have received my best effort and their business has been my chief concern and has received my earnest attention.

It has always been my greatest pleasure to help those who needed help most, and the humblest citizen in my district knows he can without hesitancy call on ZEKE CANDLER for any service he can render and the service will be cheerfully, faithfully, and promptly performed and the best possible results obtained. Not only, Mr. Chairman, have I faithfully attended to the business of my people at home in my district, but I have helped to pass many very excellent and beneficial laws now on the statute books. Permit me, briefly, to refer to some of these. Time will not allow reference to anything like all of them. The Federal reserve act is the law under which 12 great Federal reserve banks, under the control of the Government, were established which have proven a Gibraltar of strength to the business world and to the Government itself in these terrible times and made panics impossible.

Without them our people would not now have plenty of money and we could not have financed the war. They took the power from Wall Street and forever destroyed the domination of the Money Trust. This reserve system took the money out of the clenched fists of a comparatively few money sharks and distributed it throughout every section of this great Republic through the instrumentalities of these reserve banks. It put money within the reach of every citizen having sound credit based upon property or good personal securities. No longer can the heartless shylocks hold tight the money resources of the country and demand the "pound of flesh" and bleach white the blood and sinew of the toiling masses of the American people. Every citizen with approved personal credit or collateral can get money to meet his necessities and square his obligations. [Applause.]

While this system is primarily intended for what is known as "commercial business" there is provision made in section 13 of the act for making farm paper, maturing in six months, satisfactory collateral in the financial world. This was the first recognition of that character of paper in the financial legislation of this country. This has resulted in very great benefit to farmers. Another provision of the bill authorizes national banks to loan money on farm mortgages. Democrats contended for that for a long time and it was never realized until this law was passed. That, too, has been very helpful to the agriculturists.

THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

The greatest law in my judgment on the books up to this date for the farmer is the Federal farm loan act passed in July, 1916. Farmers often having the very best gilt-edged security were required in many instances to pay exorbitant rates of interest. Not so now, for under this law the farmer can borrow money on 40 years' time if he desires, or a shorter time if he chooses himself to do so, at 5½ per cent interest. Since this law has been in force $344,721,366 have been loaned to farmers. It has made the farmers free from the heartless usurer and selfish money lender of the past by furnishing them the cheapest money in history. It has already saved them $6,000,000 in interest and permitted thousands to have benefits they richly deserved but otherwise not obtainable to make life pleasant and their homes happy. With this law on the statute book the farmer will ever be a free and independent business man.

THE FEDERAL WAREHOUSE ACT.

The Federal warehouse act provides for a system of legally regulated warehouses for agricultural purposes, to handle farm products, issuing thereon uniform warehouse receipts. On these receipts so issued for farm products stored in the licensed warehouse and insured money can readily be obtained, if needed, at a reasonable rate of interest, thereby enabling the farmer to hold his products when he desires to do so for a better market.

THE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION ACT.

Under the agricultural extension act the wonderful fund of knowledge accumulated by the great Agricultural Department, during its entire existence, in agriculture, horticulture, animal industry, farm economics, raising, canning, and preserving foods, and many other useful investigations, is being placed at the service of the farmers in practically every agricultural county in the United States, under a cooperative plan, by trained men and women in the service of the Government. Under this cooperative system provided for in this law a method of itinerant agricultural teaching and demonstration of home economics and agriculture has been inaugurated, which has revolutionized, diversified, and increased production throughout our great country.

THE GOOD-ROADS ACT.

Under the "good-roads law" millions of dollars have been appropriated and is being expended by the Government in aiding the construction of good roads to the marvelous benefit of all the people. Nothing is more conducive to development and prosperity than the improvement of our roads and highways.

GENERAL AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT.

Having been for a long time and being now a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I have given special study and rendered valuable service to the great agricultural interests of my district, State, and Nation. I have helped to pass every Agricultural appropriation bill which has been passed since I have been a Member of Congress to carry on the work of the great agricultural development in our country.

I have insisted each year that agricultural appropriations should be increased to meet the ever-increasing demand and development of our great agricultural business. I have contended that such appropriations were really an investment and not in the true sense an expenditure. They always return very large profits. The result of my efforts and of others who agreed with me has been to increase these appropriations from $3,000,000 to over $30,000,000 to the benefit of the whole country. I helped to pass the law creating the Bureau of Markets, which all the farmers desired. I helped to pass the Lever Food-Control Act, through the operation of which our boys in the World War and our allies were fed with plenty, thus aiding materially the winning of the war.

I introduced, reported from the Agricultural Committee, and secured the passage of the Candler Food-Production Act, which largely extended the activities of the Department of Agriculture, resulting in a very great increase in the food production of the country during the war when it was most needed to feed our own people, our Army, our Navy, and our allies. I have actively and earnestly supported all the great work of the Agricultural Department and of the farmers throughout the country since I entered Congress, and will continue to do so in the future. Ex-Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. James Wilson, the ex-Secretary of Agriculture—the present Secretary of the Treasury—Hon. David F. Houston, and the present Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Edwin T. Meredith, would, if asked, I feel sure, bear willing testimony to the truthfulness of my statement in that regard.

LEGISLATION FOR THE SOLDIERS.

I voted for and helped to pass the soldiers' and sailors' civil rights bill to protect their families and estates, and the law providing for vocational education, training, and rehabilitation of wounded and disabled soldiers, and for Federal aid to schools and colleges to aid their education, and to provide war-risk insurance, allotments, compensation, mileage, equipment, and for everything necessary for our boys in the World War. I wanted them to have everything necessary during the war and after the war, especially when injured, and I have at all times done everything I could to help them. This statement will be verified by the soldiers themselves and their fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, and friends who have telegraphed and written me. No boy ever appealed to me himself and no one has appealed to me for any boy that I did not in every instance do for him and for his loved ones everything which could be done, and I did it cheerfully and promptly and rejoiced to have the opportunity to perform the service. I am ready, willing, and anxious to continue to do for them all I can in the future. Therefore, I invite them to continue to command me for any service I can render any of them at any and all times. [Applause.]

GENERAL LEGISLATION.

Mr. Chairman, I have voted for and helped to pass the income-tax law, law to elect United States Senators by the people, publicity of campaign expenses, Federal Trade Commission law, marine-insurance law, ship-purchase act, which reestablished our merchant marine and furnished ships to carry the products of commerce, manufacture, farm, mine, and forest to the markets of the world—important in peace and more important in war—also the Clayton antitrust law, law against profiteering, law to prevent gambling in farm products, the grain-grades bill, the law for the establishment of the Department of Labor, the law for the establishment of the Department of Commerce, the parcel-post law, the postal savings bank law, laws resulting in the extension of rural mail delivery, law restricting foreign immigration, and many other general laws too numerous to mention in the time I shall consume. In fact, I have voted for and helped to pass about all the good laws on the statute books for many years, and during that time I have voted against and helped to defeat many bad laws which were proposed, and with all this good, efficient, and active work to my credit some few people, not many, cry out in exuberant tones sometimes, "What has CANDLER ever done?" I have done much good, as the above facts disclose, all of which my record in this body will upon examination fully verify.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. Always, with pleasure, to my good friend.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly any person who would insinuate by asking what has the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] ever done or say that his work here has not been faithful and productive of results would only expose his own ignorance of the legislation of Congress. We who serve here with him know there is not a more faithful, efficient, honest, hard-working Member in this body, or one who enjoys the confidence and esteem in a higher degree of his colleagues than the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi. By his knowledge of agricultural legislation he is very useful to the farmers, and by his activity here in their interest he is familiarly known as "the farmers' friend." While agriculture has been his specialty, and he is always very active when any agricultural legislation is under consideration, he is an intelligent, safe, and useful legislator at all times, and his long experience is very valuable to this House and to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER. My friend is very kind, for which I am sincerely grateful. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have occupied the time of the House longer than I intended and I am thankful to you, my friends, for your indulgence.

RECONSTRUCTION LEGISLATION.

Permit me to say in conclusion that as to reconstruction measures I favor immediate peace by treaty secured in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution in which shall be preserved America's rights, the vindication of the wrongs we suffered, and the ideals for which our brave boys so gallantly fought. They won a great victory, adding new luster to American arms and brilliant glory to our stainless flag, and I want our country to have the results of their wonderful achievements and everything to which America and Americans are entitled. It was secured by their supreme sacrifices and therefore should never be thrown away or lost to our people or to their posterity. [Applause.] They established safe democracy and made liberty doubly secure.

Now, let us have lasting peace through a treaty which will make it abiding. Let us repeal the irksome, irritating, and troublesome war legislation which is now no longer needed or desired. Let us practice every possible economy in expenditures so as to reduce the taxes at the earliest possible date. Let us go back quickly to peace-time prewar conditions and restore quiet and tranquillity in the country, safety and security to business and, as far as possible, happiness and contentment to the homes of our people, and all will be well. We have the most marvelous country and the best country in all the world. With but 5 per cent of the earth's population, we have 24 per cent of its agricultural production, 40 per cent of its mineral wealth, and we manufacture 35 per cent of its goods. Our natural wealth is above $225,000,000,000, half the gold of the world is in the United States, and our trade balance is over $5,000,000,000. While rich in material resources, we are richer in our people. We have the bravest, noblest men and the prettiest, purest women in all the world. Who would not live for such a country; who would not, should it become necessary, die for such a people and for such a country? May God ever keep it in its integrity, its beauty, its grandeur, and its glory. Gentlemen, I thank you for your indulgent attention. [Loud applause.]

OF
HON. T. W. SIMS,
OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, prior to the passage of the transportation act that took effect on March 1, 1920, the law required that rates, fares, and charges by common carriers doing an interstate business should be just and reasonable and nondiscriminatory. This had been the rule of rate making by which the Interstate Commerce Commission had been guided ever since its existence. There was no other restriction or limitation upon the perfect freedom of action by the commission as to its rate-making powers.

But the transportation act so amended the law as to make it mandatory on the commission to permit rates, charges, and fares to be made that would yield at least 5½ per cent net return to the carriers on the total value of the property of the carriers used in transportation in the rate-making groups to be established by the commission, and that this rule of rate making should continue for at least two years from the enactment of the transportation act. Prior to the enactment of this law the justness and reasonableness of rates, fares, and charges was not determined by the value of the property of the railroads, either as separate properties or as groups. By the terms of the present law rates must be permitted that will give not less than 5½ per cent net return on the railroad property, regardless of the costs of operation. The carriers can pay any prices they see fit for supplies and materials. They can pay any compensation they see fit to pay to their officials and attorneys. They can also pay any schedule of wages that their employees may demand, and, in addition to all these expenses of operation, rates must be paid by the shipper that will yield not less than 5½ per cent on the value of the railroads. Under the present law the commission will have no power to scrutinize the amount paid by the carriers in the rate-making groups for materials and supplies or the reasonableness of the compensation paid to their officials and attorneys or the justness and reasonableness of the wages paid to their employees. In the absence of charges and proof of fraud, the commission must accept the accounts of the carriers as to all these items of expenditure and must, under the mandate of the law, permit the carriers to collect rates, fares, and charges that will, after paying all expenses of operation, give them a net return on their property of not less than 5½ per cent.

Under the present law the commission has no power to check extravagance on the part of the carriers regarding any or all these items of expense of operation, and the whole burden, whatever it may be, must be passed on to the freight and passenger paying public. Prior to the enactment of the present law the commission had the power, and exercised it, of determining, from a consideration of all pertinent facts, what were just and reasonable rates for the service rendered by the carriers, and if just and reasonable rates as fixed by the commission did not pay 2 per cent on the property value of the railroads they could make no complaint. Under the old law the carriers necessarily had to use economy in incurring any of these operating expenses, as the net return to their stockholders would suffer to the extent of any waste or extravagance incurred in operation. Under the present law no such incentive to economic operation exists, as the minimum net return to the stockholder is fixed and, to a certain extent, the maximum return to the stockholder is also fixed, as under the present law if the net earnings of the roads exceed 6 per cent one-half of all excess is forfeited by the earning carrier.

Mr. Speaker, let us examine for a few moments the possible and probable effect the present law put into effect will have on the compensation paid to railway officials. Prior to the enactment of the present law the salaries and compensation of railway officials and attorneys were fixed by the directors and were paid out of the operating revenues of the carriers and charged to expense of operation. The wages of the employees were fixed by the officials and also charged to expense of operation. All these charges had to be paid out of earnings before one cent could go to the stockholder in the way of dividends. Therefore the stockholder had a direct interest in holding down these two sources of expense of operation, and it is but reasonable to suppose that the stockholders, looking out for their own interest, would not permit excessive salaries and compensation to be paid to their officials and attorneys, and that, in so far as they could control it, they also held down the wages of employees. Labor unions of railway employees with the power to strike may have been a check on the freedom of action as to the wages paid employees, but as there were no such unions with power to strike among the railway officials and attorneys, we must presume and assume that the compensation paid them was what was thought and believed to be just and reasonable by the directors and stockholders. Wages of employees have been largely increased since 1914 and further increases are asked by the employees and no doubt will be allowed at least in some substantial amount.

Mr. Speaker, if the salaries and compensation of railway officials and attorneys, paid them prior to Government control, were just and reasonable and fair to the public and to the stockholders they certainly ought to have a substantial increase now over what they received in 1917, the last year of private operation. Will they get it? Prior to Government control the compensation and salaries of railway officials and attorneys were paid out of earnings and in effect necessarily reduced the net earnings available for dividend payments. But how is it now under the new law? It matters not what official salaries and attorney fees may be now rates must be such as will pay all such salaries and fees and in addition thereto must provide a net return of not less than 5½ per cent on the value of all railroad property in the rate-making group.

Mr. Speaker, the public, who pay the freights, fares, and charges of railroads, have a right and an interest in knowing what was paid by the railroads to their officials and attorneys before Federal control and what is now paid or will be paid to such officials, since a guaranteed net return on railroad property, over and above all operating expenses, must be paid regardless of whether rates necessary to such payment are just and reasonable or not as to the shipper, and as to the consuming public, who in the end must pay them.

During the progress of the hearings on the House bill providing for the return of the railroads to their owners I requested Commissioner McChord to furnish for printing, as part of our hearings, if available, a tabulated list of the salaries paid by the railroad corporations to their officials in excess of $5,000 per annum. As requested, Commissioner McChord transmitted to me on October 23, 1919, the list asked for by me, but I was unable on account of its length to have it printed in the hearings. But the list is so important, and as it has not been printed by the Railroad Administration or by the Interstate Commerce Commission, I feel that it ought to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am therefore, under the permission given me to extend my remarks, making the letter of Commissioner McChord, transmitting the said list, and the list a part of my remarks:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, October 23, 1919.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
Interstate Commerce Committee, House of Representatives.

DEAR JUDGE SIMS: When our legislative committee was before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce last week, you asked me whether the wage commission, of which I was a member, had tabulated a list of the salaries paid by the various railroad corporations to their officials in excess of $5,000 per annum. I advised you then that such a list had been made and was a part of the record in the wage commission investigation. You requested me to send you a copy of it for the committee's use and to be made a part of the present hearings.

I find that I have only one copy in my files, and in compliance with your request I am sending original and supplemental copies to you. If these go into the RECORD and are printed you need not return them to me. otherwise I shall thank you to return them as they are the only copies I have.

Very truly, yours,

C. C. MCCHORD,
Commissioner.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM RAYBURN,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, with the recent amendments to the war-risk insurance act the law to-day is the most liberal for all soldiers, both disabled and not disabled, ever passed for war veterans in any country.

Mr. Speaker, this law is a source of great pride to me, as I feel that I may without immodesty say that I have had as much and probably more to do with making it what it is than any other Member. When the bill was first introduced and referred to the committee of which I am a member, I was designated by the chairman to take full charge of the legislation on the floor of the House. It will always be one of the greatest joys of my life that I have in this way been able to do something for the soldiers of the late war in liberally providing for the disabled and for the dependents of those who gave their lives for their country.

I appreciate beyond expression the many compliments that I have received here and elsewhere on my work on the law. I here insert in the RECORD a letter that I received at the time of the passage of the bill from the then Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. William G. McAdoo:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, September 17, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. RAYBURN: May I not congratulate you heartily on the fine service you have rendered to your country and to the enlisted men and officers in the Army and Navy and to their dependent families during this war with Germany, in securing the passage by the House of Representatives of the so-called war insurance and compensation bill?

It is a splendid achievement, and reflects credit upon the American people as well as upon you and your colleagues, who have secured the passage of this just and humane law by the House of Representatives.

With all good wishes, I am,

Cordially, yours, (Signed) W. G. MCADOO.

My good friend from Alabama, Mr. BANKHEAD, who has taken unusual interest in this measure, was kind enough to say the following of me and which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD last September:

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this body does not, in the main, encourage personal compliments from one Member to another. Without trespassing, I trust, upon that standard of propriety, I feel that I am expressing the sentiment and judgment of the entire membership of the House in commending by highest praise the invaluable services rendered in the preparation and passage of this fine legislation by our colleague, Hon. SAM RAYBURN, of Texas. [Applause.] No one will believe that this expression is prompted by any spirit of invidious compliment. Upon the contrary, I feel sure that every member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee will cordially join in the sentiments of appreciation I am trying to express.

The gentleman from Texas to whom I have referred, from the inception of this great system of insurance and compensation for our soldiers and their dependents, has been recognized as an expert upon its purposes and its administration. In making the contribution of his time and splendid mental talents to the now largely perfected system, he has not only honored his district and his party but, what is infinitely more important, he has rendered to the disabled soldiers and to that vast multitude of the dependents of our honored soldier dead a distinct, outstanding, invaluable public service. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I could add many such as the above from those who know of this law here and elsewhere, but I fear it would be trespassing on time and space, and for myself it is not necessary as all of the reward that I could ask is that I have a full consciousness of having sought to the limit of my ability to take care of those who have given themselves so freely to the service of their country.

Full Recognition, a Port, Arms, and a Loan, Not a Mandate for Armenia.

SPEECH

OF

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 24, 1920.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11960) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, Gen. Ludendorf said in his memoirs recently that if they had been able to secure fuel in their last big drive they would have reached Paris and beaten the Frenchmen, but that the lack of fuel oil for their machines had made it impossible to succeed. He said that was due to the fact that the immense oil fields at Baku had slipped from their hands and fallen into the hands of the Armenians. On this part of the map to which I am pointing is the city of Baku, which is the seat of the greatest oil fields anywhere outside of the United States. When the Russian Army on the front next to Germany collapsed, you will remember that all of the soldiers started for home. There were in the army then something like 160,000 Armenians, and they also started for home. They went across into Asia, along the railroad that runs to Baku through a mountain valley there next to the Caspian Sea, and they reached Baku on the road to Armenia. Bagratooni, who was chief of staff to Kerensky at one time, found himself in the mêlée at Baku.

That country is inhabited by Tartars, who are all Mohammedans, and Bagratooni, a very brilliant man and a powerful organizer, conceived the theory that it was a good deal easier and safer for him to rally his soldiers and take his stand there than to sit around and chew his thumb. So he collected those Armenian soldiers, who were assembled there, 12,000 strong, and with 3,000 Russians formed an army of 15,000, and took possession of the city of Baku, and nobody on this side of the world knew what he was doing there for weeks. But he defeated the Turks and defeated the Tartars, and by terrific fighting held the city and the oil fields during that great drive, in which the Germans claim they would have been successful if it had not been that he choked off their fuel supply. If that is true, and Ludendorf says it is—and I suppose he is as good a witness on that point as anybody—then we are indebted to Bagratooni and his Armenian Army for the German defeat on the western front.

History tells us that when Allenby was around Jerusalem, and when he took Damascus, he had 8,000 Armenian soldiers in his army, and he said that if all the Turkish Army had been there he could not have beaten them, but that thousands of them were in Armenia trying to beat the Armenians. They had assembled 30,000 or 40,000 men who did splendid fighting, and held thousands of those Turks from fighting Allenby. Twice they turned the scales, and we owe these men who fought there some consideration. That is why I have asked you for 15 minutes.

They have formed a little country from Russian Armenia. Their capital is there at Erivan, a thriving city about 20 miles from Mount Ararat. This place here—north—is Tiflis, a city of 200,000 people, the capital of Georgia. Here is Baku—on the east—which is now in a Mohammedan country. The European conference, I understand, has announced Azerbaijan—Tartars—and Georgia, two nations, as free and independent nations; down here [pointing south on map] is Persia.

I thought that I would make a motion here to-day, including in one amendment Turkey and Armenia and Georgia, but I realized that if Armenia is attached to the Persian Legation it will be much preferable. There is no railroad to Persia's capital, Teheran, and there is very little for an American to do there. We maintain a minister there, who comes from the district I have the honor to represent, and there is about as little to do there as at any place to which we send a minister anywhere on earth.

Our minister to Persia ought to be transferred from the city of Teheran, which is away from any railroad or sea, and placed at Erivan in Armenia. The ministry should read "Minister to Armenia, Georgia, and Persia." My amendment now offered is to perfect that plan. The countries are contiguous. The railroad runs from Erivan to Tiflis, to Batoum on the Black Sea, and to Baku on the Caspian. You can go by rail to Baku and sail from there by boat to the Persian coast, and then by automobile on a Russian-made road to Teheran. The road runs to Tabriz, the second city in Persia, where we have many enterprises. A minister at Erivan would be at the business center of four nations—Armenia, Georgia, Persia, and, if Azerbaijan is to be permanent, a fourth. We will then have at Erivan a minister to Armenia, Persia, Georgia, and Azerbaijan, instead of one at Teheran, and it will not cost a dollar more than we are now expending.

Such recognition would go very far to stop the Turkish Government's murder of Armenians, and if we assure them a seaport at Trebizond or the Mediterranean, Armenia would need no more from Christendom but financial aid. This would be some acknowledgment of what Armenian soldiers have done for our Allies.

If Andranik is not entitled to a little courtesy from this Republic, why did you not tell him so when he took his sword in hand and proceeded to fight the enemy? For years he fought them. He fought them in 1904, and they ran him out, and subsequently his life was not safe. When this war began he went back there. You did not give him a gun nor ammunition, nor did any other civilized nation.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Is this what the gentleman proposes to do, simply to give an ambassador to one State the additional title of minister or ambassador to certain other countries?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I do not see how that will cost this country a dollar.

Mr. LITTLE. It will not cost a cent. All that will be necessary for the committee to do is to have the point of order withheld, if it is not too late to do that. These people refused to treat with the Turks. Why did they not make the point of order then against Andranik? Bagratooni fought them there until they shot one leg off of him, and he is limping around this town now on one leg, seeking to get a little consideration from you. He is one of the greatest military chieftains in this war. He was Kerensky's chief of staff in this war. He is now here, and when he asks to have his country given some little recognition you make a point of order. Andranik, like Marcos Bozzaris, fought without soldiers and without ammunition. He fought with an independent command in Armenia. When he got done fighting Germany and Turkey they said, "For God's sake choke off that little Armenian mountain chief." He established his Government at Erivan, under the shadow of Mount Ararat, where Noah lodged. He did that without any encouragement from anybody. Why did you make a point of order on this now? The Turks gave way. He has beaten them to a standstill, and they got tired fighting him.

I know that the British Empire has not given to his country this recognition that I suggest, but they are not in the same position that we are. You must remember that there are just about as many Moslems under the British Empire as there are Christians. I do not blame the British Government so much for their policy. Almost half of their subjects are Moslems. But our people are Christians. Ours is not a Moslem country. The statesmen of this Republic are not afraid of what the statesmen of England fear. We are not afraid of insurrection here. But the British statesmen are afraid of insurrection in their Arabian countries and in Egypt and among the millions of Mohammedans in India, and they must go slowly in protecting Armenia against the Turks and the Tartars who surround them, or at least they so think.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Has the executive department recommended this?

Mr. LITTLE. No; it has not. I do not know why the President of the United States takes the view he holds, but I suppose he takes a view similar to that of England. It may be that the influences and circumstances by which he is surrounded tend to make him believe he can not cut loose from the views of Clemenceau and Lloyd-George. I think perhaps he would be glad if we went ahead and relieved him of a little responsibility in this matter and took a different view of this question from the view entertained by Great Britain and France. France is understood to desire to get possession of all this territory [indicating on map] around the Mediterranean. Right here, in Cilicia, there are 200,000 Armenians. The French are going to take control of that. I am not now urging that we put an army in there nor to do anything except to say to Armenia, "We will treat you as well as we do Persia. You will have the man we send to Persia sent to your country. We will have a minister there to recognize your Christian nation." That will be the effect of this amendment, and no more.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. With pleasure.

Mr. SNYDER. What will the Persians say about that?

Mr. LITTLE. The Persians will have nothing to say about it. They have indeed very little to say about their own country. For years either the Russian or British influence has dominated Persia and controlled its Government. Our business with them is of no importance and their business with us is of less. There is no reason why we should maintain an embassy there. Erivan is on a railroad line that makes it a better city for Persians to reach than their own capital in all probability. If we continue at Teheran we will not assist in any development of the country or get any results. From Erivan among the Armenians, who are great business men as well as great soldiers, commercial influences will soon extend to all parts of Persia. It would be a vast benefit to Persia to make the change and transfer our minister from Teheran to Erivan, for it will open up a new world to them. It is the Armenians who opened up the big oil fields at Baku and carried on most of the big business enterprises in the Turkish Empire for centuries. The Armenians are always a helpful people in any community, in any country, and this change to Erivan, their capital, will really help Persia as much as it will Armenia, except that it carries with it their recognition as a Republic.

If we had recognized the independence of the Republic of Armenia two years ago and given them a little financial aid for military purposes so that they could equip their armies and maintain them, they would now have a hundred thousand men in arms and have long since driven the Turks out of Trebizond, as they did, and out of Cilicia, and brought peace and the beginning of prosperity to all that wretched country. In 60 days they could raise, mobilize, and equip 60,000 of the best soldiers in the world under Andranik and Bagratooni right now, and whip the life out of the Turks, if they could secure financial assistance. Armenia has never asked for a mandate with a great army from America or any other country. All they ask is enough help to enable them to stand on their feet and shake the Turks' grip from their throat before the Russian Soviet has a chance to overrun their country.

A regiment or two of marines perhaps, a few American officers perhaps, and a few millions of money we have spent in other places, are all the Armenians want.

Why do not our congressional committees call before them and give hearings to Andranik and Bagratooni? Why do not the Secretary of State and the President of the United States give audience to these fighting men who had as much to do with our final success as any similar body of ten times their number anywhere on earth? If our Government had recognized them a year ago the Turks would have felt that we meant business, that Christianity was back of them, and that it was dangerous to murder an Armenian. All they needed was a policeman's badge from Christendom. They enrolled beneath the star of Bethlehem 1,600 years ago when our ancestors were pagans in the woods. If this is a Christian people, we should act like Christian people. The bankers at Paris can dicker in the tobacco trade at Trebizond and seek to control what should be the Armenian ports on the Mediterranean; Great Britain, which is almost as much of a Mohammedan Empire as it is a Christian Empire, can pause before the possible wrath of a Moslem world, but America has a higher code of morals and a loftier aspiration and a mightier responsibility.

Armenia seeks no mandate. All she needs is thorough recognition, a port by the sea, and a military equipment to fight their own battles. The Georgians and the Armenians are rivals in the east. If an effort were made to give Armenia access to the sea through Georgia and its port of Batum, one would simply precipitate further rivalry and final warfare. If Armenia is to be free and maintain herself, if the east is really to become a Christian east and a prosperous east, America should stand shoulder to shoulder with this little nation, not by a mandate, but in a way the Armenians ask, by giving her a seaport and material equipment and $50,000,000 worth of seed for the next crop, which is the only charity that they ask. You must get over the idea that the Armenians are helpless beggars crying for aid. They have never asked any armies from anybody. They have done a thousand times as much for Christendom in the last five years as Christendom ever did for Armenia.

Armenia is not asking any mandate. Give her arms, now lying idle; ammunition, now stored; economic aid; an American minister at Erivan; and a door to the sea of her own, untrammeled by Georgia or France. The cry of Ajax is Armenia's.

> Dispel this cloud, the light of Heaven restore;
> Give me to see, and Ajax asks no more.

If Ludendorf and Allenby tell the truth, the war would not have been won when it was but for the fight that these martial mountaineers, these Scotchmen of the Orient, put up at Baku, in Karabagh, and in Turkey itself. Give them their seaports on the Black Sea or the Mediterranean, and in a year they will have railroads built to whatever ports you give them and be in touch with the world. If Christianity gives them a little money, Armenia will take care of itself, just as she has done so far wherever she could get the ground to stand on and draw a long breath and start a fight against the Turks and Tartars.

But a little longer, a little more of neglect from Christendom, and Armenia will after all these ages be no more, and Christendom will cry with Lady Macbeth, when it is too late, "There is blood upon these hands." Is it possible that after all these half dozen years of sacrifice and struggle Christendom will forget that little nation which was the pebble upon which the enemy slipped and fell? Is it possible that the only nation which came out of this great contest having won its freedom sword in hand from our foes shall now be denied the ordinary justice that business common sense suggests? Mr. Chairman, I would not wish to be the man upon whom could be fixed the responsibility of denying the recognition for Armenia which my amendment would carry, and for one I am determined that my conscience shall not bear that burden. If America longer turns a deaf ear to these people, not all the waters in the rough, rude seas can wash the blood of the Armenians from the hands of Christendom.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. The newspaper dispatches indicate that France wants to take possession of these territories. I understand they claim that it is a sort of Alsace-Lorraine proposition. What have you to say about that?

Mr. LITTLE. France never had any rights in Cilicia. It is a big thing when you attempt to interfere with France and England about these matters. The French and British have troubles of their own, and naturally they seek to control the trade of the East, even if the Armenians suffer. But America has no such difficulty. The committee should wave the point of order and permit us to send an embassy to Armenia and give them a real standing, or they must share with the State Department the responsibility for our neglect to accord the safety for Armenia our action would assure. They should allow us to insert here an appropriation that will provide for some recognition of and send a representative to the Christian State of Armenia. It is 16 centuries, gentlemen, since that nation became a Christian nation. Either the United States is a Christian Nation or it is not. If it is not, let us quit making a bluff that this is a Christian Nation. I do not pretend to be as much of a Christian as some of you, officially, but I am enough of a Christian to believe that those people who for 16 centuries have upheld the banners of Christianity in the Orient should receive American arms and recognition now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

What the Radicals Are Advocating.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY U. HARDY,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 8, 1920.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks by giving just a few more of the views of the radicals of this country. The radicals are scattered through quite a number of groups. Perhaps the I. W. W. is the largest group. The Socialist Party has been split up into three groups—Socialists proper, or the right wing; Communist Labor, pretty radical; and Communist Party, left wing, extremely radical. There are dozens of other radical federations, societies, leagues, and groups. Attorney General Palmer says 472 radical papers spread the doctrines of the radicals through the United States, 222 printed in 23 different foreign languages, 106 in English, and 144 coming in from foreign lands.

And now I wish to give you some brief samples of what these radicals stand for, told in their own words. If you read between the lines you will see some things not in the type, although the written words are pretty frank.

The Communist Party has issued a manifesto in which it says:

> The Communist Party recognizes that the American Federation of Labor is reactionary and a bulwark of capitalism.
> Councils of workers shall be organized in the shops as circumstances allow for the purpose of carrying on the industrial union struggle in the old unions, uniting and mobilizing the militant elements, these councils to be unified in a central council wherever possible.
> It shall be a major task of the Communist Party to agitate for the construction of a general industrial union organization embracing the I. W. W., W. I. I. U., independent and secession unions, militant unions of the American Federation of Labor, and the unorganized workers on the basis of the revolutionary class struggle.
> The Communist Party shall keep in the foreground its consistent appeal for proletarian revolution, the overthrow of capitalism, and the establishment of a dictatorship of the proletariat.
> Communism does not propose to "capture" the bourgeois parliamentary state, but to conquer and destroy it.

Let Mr. Morris Hillquit, who is a prominent Socialist, and came near being elected mayor of New York, speak of his party. He says:

> The split in the ranks of American socialism raises an interesting question of policy. What shall be the attitude of the Socialist Party toward the newly formed "communist" organization?
> The division was not brought about by differences on vital questions of principles. It arose over disputes on methods and policy, and even within that limited sphere it was largely one of emphasis rather than fundamentals.
> Let us center our whole fight upon capitalism, and let us hope our communist brethren will go and do likewise.

The official publication of the bureau of information of soviet Russia recently made this announcement:

> Mr. Morris Hillquit has accepted the post of counselor of the Russian soviet bureau in the United States. Mr. Hillquit will be in charge of the legal department of the bureau. * * * Mr. Hillquit has been in close touch with Mr. Martens and his bureau from the very day of Mr. Martens's appointment.

A brief extract from Vincent St. John's History of the I. W. W. will give you a little idea of its aims:

STRUCTURE OF THE I. W. W. AND METHODS.

In its basic principle the I. W. W. calls forth that spirit of revolt and resistance that is so necessary a part of the equipment of any organization of the workers in their struggle for economic independence. In a word, its basic principle makes the I. W. W. a fighting organization. It commits the union to an unceasing struggle against the private ownership and control of industry.

There is but one bargain that the I. W. W. will make with the employing class—complete surrender of all control of industry to the organized workers.

The experience of the past has proven the mass form of organization, such as that of the Knights of Labor, to be as powerless and unwieldy as a mob.

* * * * * *

As a revolutionary organization the Industrial Workers of the World aims to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least expenditure of time and energy. The tactics used are determined solely by the power of the organization to make good in their use. The question of "right" and "wrong" does not concern us.

No terms made with an employer are final. All peace so long as the wage system lasts is but an armed truce. At any favorable opportunity the struggle for more control of industry is renewed.

The Industrial Workers of the World maintains that nothing will be conceded by the employers except that which we have the power to take and hold by the strength of our organization. Therefore we seek no agreements with the employers.

Failing to force concessions from the employers by the strike, work is resumed and "sabotage" is used to force the employers to concede the demands of the workers.

The future belongs to the I. W. W. The day of the skilled worker is passed.

Eugene Debs, convict and Socialist candidate for President, wrote in his own book:

It is a question not of reform, the mask of fraud, but of revolution. The flag, the only flag of freedom, we reaffirm it and on this day pledge anew fidelity—come life, come death—to the blood-red banner of the revolution.

The Appeal to Reason says:

Labor demands all the products of its hands—and it is going to have them, let the consequences be what they will. It may cause the slaughter and massacre of millions. None has a right to live who will not help to produce the wealth that sustains the people of the planet.

The Workers' Council of Butte recently ran a full-page advertisement in the Butte Daily Bulletin, a portion of which is given here:

The working class of all countries must unite and down this brutal, cunning, robbing capitalist class.

The working class must act as a class. Fight en masse. Class action and mass action are the same.

Are you with us, fellow workers? This is a call from your mates in the factory—your comrades in oppression.

Are you a coward or a red-blooded rebel? If you are a cowardly cur, then do your master's bidding, help him to crush your class, stab the whitened bosom of your sisters and wives, and hold your children in the hell of capitalist slavery.

If you are a rebel and hate your master's bloody, greedy rule, then arouse your fellow workers to action. Raise your banner high. The day is here. Push back the tyrants. Rip their hypocritical masks from the faces made horrible by their greed. Down with them, you sons of freedom!

No compromise! No reforming slavery! No more red herrings and sops to quiet our voices!

Down with capitalism! All power to the working class! We have nothing to lose but our chains; we have a world to gain!

Come on, you sons of toil, be you an artisan in the factory or a worker at the plow! Come on! Down with capitalism! Up with the glorious commonwealth of the workers! Come on!

Victory to the working class; down with capitalism.

WORKERS' COUNCIL OF BUTTE.

Here is a new code of morals suggested by the International Socialist Review:

THE NEW MORALITY.

The new morality says:
Damn interest!
Damn rent!
Damn profits!
Damn agreements!
The power must be taken out of the policeman's club!
How?
Anyhow!
Why?
Because it hurts our class and is therefore immoral.

The guns mustn't point our way if they aren't spiked, because they are liable to go off and hurt us, and that would be immoral.

So we must spike the guns or turn them round. Anyhow, and because it hurts our class and is immoral.

If we go on strike we must strike quickly, sudden, and certainly. Don't give the boss time to think or prepare plans. He might get the better of us and that would be bad for us and immoral.

Strike when he has a big order which he must fulfill. It will hurt him more and us less, and that is moral.

Tie up the industries in town, all the industries in all the towns, in the whole country, or in the whole world if necessary. The strike will end quicker and we will starve less, and that's good for us, and therefore moral.

Don't strike for more than you have a right to demand.

You have a right to demand all you have power to enforce.

I could quote from dozens of platforms and manifestos, from hundreds of papers and people, and fill a thousand pages with these exhibits, but we will let it go with these few samples, surely enough to indicate that honest labor may well guard its ranks against anarchistic leaders, and that real dangers confront our land from red radicalism.

The Negro in the War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. KING,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 2, 1920.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I heartily join in all encomiums upon the entire Army of the United States engaged in the late trans-Atlantic war, and I desire at this time to say a word in highest praise for the heroic part the black soldiers of this Nation played therein, and to congratulate them for their noble efforts in behalf of America.

Adjutant General P. C. Harris informs me that more than 384,000 colored enlisted men served in the Army during the period of hostilities. Of those approximately 368,000 entered the service under selective-service regulations; approximately 5,300 were members of the National Guard in Federal service; 5,571 were members of the Regular Army at the outbreak of hostilities, and approximately 5,800 were enlisted as volunteers, and were assigned to duty in accordance with the needs of the service.

Some 180,000 colored soldiers served with the American Expeditionary Forces, and it has been estimated that approximately 35,000 of these were members of organizations that were actually under the enemy's fire. Of this number 561 were killed in action or died of wounds received in action, and 1,378 were wounded.

No statement I have heard better expresses the fighting spirit of the black soldier than the words of Maj. Clark L. Dickson of the Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry. Maj. Dickson stated:

These soldiers have made a name for themselves in France that will never be forgotten. They trained for two months near the Argonne and then went to the Argonne front—and say, tell the people that these boys fought like hell from that time on until the end of the war.

While these negro boys were displaying this remarkable courage and valor on the field of battle in Europe, others were working in munition factories, steel plants, and armor shops producing the materials which enabled the United States and its allies to win the war. To them belongs a great share of credit for the overwhelming defeat of the Teutonic powers.

In this connection I desire to state that there are millions of negroes in the United States who are law-abiding, peaceful, and vital factors in our great industrial life, and by their daily life and conduct reflect credit upon their race and contribute to the upbuilding of the communities in which they live.

The Farmer and the City Dweller.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE MacGREGOR,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13931) entitled "A bill to authorize the association of producers of agricultural products."

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, there are many questions vitally affecting the American people, but none is more important than food. I fear that the people of the Nation as a whole are blind to the serious situation that is confronting them.

The boys are leaving the farm, farmers are unable to hire men to work the farms, and the prospect is that this fall the people will find that food prices will go sky-high.

This will cause greater discontent and perhaps serious disorder in our midst. For years there has been an antagonism between the city and the farm. There should never have been any antagonism because each is dependent upon the other. The city is more dependent than the farmer.

One great problem that we must solve is the elimination of the great cost in getting food from the farmer to the city dweller. There must be a greater degree of cooperation between the farmer and the city man to this end.

A group of men in the city of Buffalo known as the food section of the Wholesale Merchants and Manufacturers' Association have taken the intiative in this important matter; and, to the end that other cities may pattern after Buffalo, I take the liberty of inserting a declaration of principles of the association for the guidance and information of the Members of the House:

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES FOR THE GREATER FARM PRODUCTION CAMPAIGN OF THE WHOLESALE MERCHANTS AND MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF BUFFALO.

We believe the time is here when there should be a better understanding and cooperation between the people in the cities who are consumers, manufacturers, and distributors of the products of the farm, and the people on the farms who are the producers and the backbone of the Nation.

We are of the opinion that the farmer is the most independent factor in our modern American life; that he does not need charity nor condescension; that for the welfare of the Nation there should be a spirit of frankness and helpfulness between those in urban communities and those outside.

We believe that unless the farm can be made to offer equal chances for education, emolument, and advancement compared with other major occupations, the present high type of American farmer may pass away and be succeeded by an inferior type detrimental to the best interests of the country; and to work toward securing these advantages to people in rural communities shall be part of our problem.

We recognize that fully one-third of our population is essential to the production of foodstuffs for the other two-thirds, and it therefore is essential that we must spend on our tables an amount sufficient to insure adequate compensation to the farmer that he may enjoy those cardinal benefits of our American Constitution—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

We assume that the most important part we can play in this situation is that of educating the people of the city to a better understanding and sympathy with the farmer and his problems to the end of getting the needed cooperation between city and country. It is apparent that civilization can not properly function on a six-hour day, and that the farmer should not be called upon to do all the honest labor needed. To bring about a better conformity between farm labor and city labor conditions and an equalization of the burden borne by each shall be our aim.

We hope to work with the farmer in easing his labor problems, improving his means of transportation, fighting legislation aimed against him, and making it easier for him to manage farm finances.

The Right of Farmers to Organize.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY T. RAINEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize the association of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a substitute for the Capper-Hersman bill. It authorizes farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, or fruit growers to act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in preparing for market and in marketing in interstate and foreign commerce the products of their members. I predict that it will pass the House by a very large majority, indeed, and that it will also pass the Senate. It will be signed by the President and will become a law. This gives to farmers the rights which are in effect exercised under the law by all the branches of industry with which they come in contact. The farmer is the only producer who is now compelled to accept for his products exactly what a combination of wholesalers and middlemen are willing to pay and no more. He is also compelled to pay for his farm implements—his machinery of all kinds—exactly the price a combination of manufacturers tells him to pay, and he is permitted to pay no less.

ALL OTHER LABORERS ORGANIZED.

The farmer is a skilled laborer, the highest skilled laborer in the modern scheme of civilization. All other laborers are permitted to organize and do organize. They are permitted to bargain collectively and do bargain collectively, and to-day 5,000,000 laborers are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, fixing their own wages, and the amount of wages they fix is reflected in the increased cost of farm implements 8,000,000 farmers are compelled to buy.

During the war three-fourths of our soldiers came from the rural sections of the country. Exemptions given to farmers upon the theory that they were engaged in an essential occupation were few indeed. Boys who had worked a few weeks in boiler factories clinching rivets were regarded as skilled laborers whose work was essential and were exempted. Farmers did not complain. They produced bread grains and food animals on a scale heretofore unprecedented in the history of nations. They were told that "food would win the war," and food did win the war. Other laborers refused to work over eight hours a day. The farmers worked eight hours during the war, but they worked eight hours in the morning and eight hours in the afternoon of every day, assisted by their boys who were too young to go to war and by their wives and daughters.

FARMERS PRODUCING NOW AT A LOSS.

Responding to commands from Washington they speeded up the production of foodstuffs until now the production of foodstuffs exceeds the demand, and with our foreign markets shut off prices have declined until farmers are producing food animals and dairy products at a loss. I know what I am talking about. I am a farmer myself, and farming and dairying is my only occupation.

FARMERS CONFRONTED WITH ORGANIZATIONS.

To-day when the products the farmer produces are ready for the market he finds himself confronted with organizations of numerous individuals—organizations permitted by the law of the land—in control of the railroads of the country. In the Pennsylvania Railroad system alone in January of this year there were 100,000 stockholders. There are hundreds of thousands of railroad owners all over the United States who fix the charge to the farmer for transporting his produce to the markets of the country, and they are permitted to fix the charge under the direction of an agency of the Federal Government. When the farmer gets his food animals to Chicago, or Kansas City, or St. Louis he finds himself confronted with a combination of packers who pay for produce of this character just what they are willing to pay and no more. He is compelled to accept the price they make, and they make, all of them, the same price every day. One packer will buy the produce of many thousands of farmers at his own price. The farmer buys all of his implements from a combination of manufacturers, which has been slowly forming for many years. There is no competition now in the markets in the matter of the sale of farm machinery and farm implements. He pays just what they tell him to pay.

FARMERS HAVE SUBMITTED UNTIL NOW TO THESE CONDITIONS.

For a long time the farmers of the land have submitted to the exactions and the conditions imposed by all these organizations, which are considered necessary in order to sustain the complicated machinery of civilization, until at last the farmer is ready to organize and in his own interest to demand the opportunity, with his own organizations, to confront the organizations which are opposed to him and to bargain and deal collectively with the organizations which bargain and deal collectively with him.

FARMERS NEVER STRIKE.

Farmers never strike. I am wondering what would happen if they did; but with the present prices for farm produce, you can not expect farmers to work and to labor and in time of peace to produce food animals and bread grains at a loss. Unless the farmer is given this opportunity to organize and to obtain a fair living wage for the work of himself and his family, he will produce less and less of food animals, and less and less of bread grains, and the sections of the country to suffer from this inevitable situation will be the great cities and their thickly populated suburbs.

MOVEMENT TOWARD THE CITIES.

Of course, there is a movement from the farm toward the cities. Boys go to the cities to obtain the higher wages offered in the cities and to participate in the pleasures and in the comforts possible in the cities. They go to the cities in order to work less hours per day than they are required to work on the farm. The movement toward the cities is one of the alarming features of our present-day civilization. It is absurd to expect the farmer to be compelled to compete with the wages paid in the cities as the result of the demands of organized labor. To-day the wages of farm labor go ever higher and higher. The farmer can not produce and meet the conditions which confront him, including the price of labor on his own farm, unless he is permitted to organize and to bargain collectively in this age of collective bargaining.

FARMING, BIGGEST BUSINESS IN THE WORLD.

Farming is the most important business conducted in the world, and we are the greatest agricultural nation in the world. Our farms under intensive cultivation are capable of producing more than they now produce for our increasing population, but if we are to get a movement back toward the farm from the crowded centers, we must be able to make farm life more attractive. The farmer's wife is entitled to the conveniences in her house that the more fortunate dwellers in cities possess. She is entitled to running water, to sewerage, to electric lights, to all the modern conveniences which make life in the cities attractive and easy. The farmer, himself, is entitled to power machinery and to the numerous conveniences which a larger income would make possible in this day of progress.

RIGHT TO ORGANIZE AND TO ELIMINATE WASTE.

The right to organize and to eliminate the waste between the farmer and the actual consumer will in the end result not only in larger profits for the farmer but will result in decreased prices to the consumer. Produce from the farm for which the farmer receives $1 reaches the consumer now at a cost of $2 or more than that. Much of the cost of distribution is waste. Organizations of farmers can do much toward eliminating the waste which occurs somewhere between the farmer and the consumer in the cities, waste which benefits no one but which ought to be eliminated.

THIS A STEP IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION.

I have stood always for measures which benefit the great farming section of our population, and I expect to vote for this measure. It is a step in the right direction—a long step in the right direction—but only the first step. In this period of unrest, which permeates this Nation and the entire world, we depend first of all upon the sanity and the patriotism of the farmers. I predict that the small measure of relief granted by this bill will not be refused. I expect this bill to pass the House by one of the largest majorities any measure has received in the House in recent years.

The United States Railroad Labor Board, Sitting at Chicago, Should Not Delay Action. Profiteers Should be Prosecuted and Punished. Railroad Employees Must Have Quick Relief.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, May 28, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense and for other purposes, approved June 3, 1916.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, a previous Congress, of which I was not a Member, and of which the Democrats were in large majority, during the period of the war passed a bill taking over the railroads, agreeing to return them to the owners when the war was over and to pay the owners a rental equal to the average earnings for the three years prior to the war.

As a Member of this body I believed it my duty to carry out the agreement so made. I therefore voted for the great appropriations necessary to pay the rentals and also the deficit—loss in operation—of over $1,000,000,000, and also voted for the bill authorizing the President to return the roads to the owners according to the agreement previously made. But the point I am coming to is this, Mr. Speaker—I have just returned from my district, and while there I had occasion to make some inquiry of railroad employees as to how they were getting along, and I found that many of these men were not making much more than enough to pay their grocery bills. The men need a raise and need it badly. They must have help and have it quickly. The people of this country do not want labor to be borne down. The men who toil with hands and brain represent the great majority of our people. They must not be pauperized in order that the profiteer may satiate his greed. At Williamson, W. Va., my wife paid, for not more than enough food to feed my family for one day, $8.50. Here are some of the costs: A loaf of bread 15 cents; a pound of sugar 35 cents; one cucumber 35 cents; 2 grape fruit 45 cents; a steak, no larger than ones hand, 90 cents.

Railroad men in West Virginia are of the best of men, but unless their wages are raised or the profiteers strangled, I can not say what course they will pursue. Having in mind that I ought to lend my efforts in their behalf, and I am only one of 435 Members of this body, I sent by wire, on Friday of this week, the following message:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD LABOR BOARD,
Chicago, Ill.:

Four months have now elapsed since the transportation act became law, and wage demands of railway employees remain unsettled. As Representative in Congress of employees of the Norfolk & Western, Baltimore & Ohio, Chesapeake & Ohio, and Virginian Railroad Companies, I respectfully, but earnestly, insist that you proceed with the greatest possible speed in the readjustment of the wages of the men whom I have the honor to represent. The executives have conceded that the employees are entitled to relief, and my own investigation fully confirms that view. A just and speedy settlement of the great question before you would be appreciated not only by my constituents but by all others as well. An award of the character mentioned, aside from doing justice to the men, would have a sedative effect upon public nerves. The men in my district have been patient and long-suffering, but they should not be expected to remain so very much longer. Appreciating your difficulties and responsibilities, may I express the hope that a favorable award may soon be forthcoming?

WELLS GOODYKOONTZ.

In reply to this message, I received from the board the following letter:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD LABOR BOARD,
Chicago, Ill., May 29, 1920.

Hon. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your telegram of the 28th, addressed to the board, insisting that we proceed with the greatest possible speed, received and laid before the members of the board for their information.

I assure you that the board is proceeding with all energy that it is capable of and with all speed that it is possible to exercise consistent with sound judgment and discretion.

We note you say you appreciate the difficulties and responsibilities of our position. I hope you do, but am sure you could have no adequate idea of the full extent of the difficulties nor the complications that surround us unless you were in our position and had seen and know what we do. It is quite difficult to take a step without danger of creating more dissatisfaction and disturbance than now exists. Every member of the board fully and keenly appreciates the necessity for as prompt relief as possible, but we also see and realize the complications and difficulties that surround the matter. I can assure you that as soon as the board can arrive at any solution which will give even temporary relief that can be afforded in a shape that will not do harm, the board will act.

Yours, very truly,

R. M. BARTON, Chairman.

Mr. Speaker, there are about 110,000,000 people in the United States, divided into about 22,000,000 families. Each of these families must have food to eat, clothing to wear, and fuel in winter to keep them warm. These—food, clothing, and fuel—are fundamental necessities, absolutely essential to human existence.

The constantly mounting cost of living, with no signs of abatement, has served to create an intolerable condition and in the minds of the people a feeling of alarm and resentment that bodes no good for the Republic, which, if not corrected, will lead to anarchy, revolution, and ruin.

When a person suffering with pain applies to a physician for relief the doctor proceeds to make a diagnosis, recognizing the disease from its symptoms. This involves a discovery of the cause of the disease; and having made the diagnosis and discovered the cause, he applies the remedy. In like manner must we proceed in respect to the ailment of the body politic, the collective body of people living under an organized political government. The procedure, however, is simplified from the fact that we already know what the disease is, for unmistakably it is "the high cost of living," virulent in form, malignant in character. Its symptoms are sharply defined, and these, without blinking, stare at every householder in every business transaction. We see its manifestation in the purchase of groceries, such as butter, eggs, bacon, and sugar; dry goods, especially woolen and cotton garments; and in shoes, hardware, drugs—everything. Not long since my wife and I, in order to make some little purchases, went into a large department store in the city of Washington. The prices were astonishingly high, and my attention was drawn to the troubled countenance of the almost innumerable shoppers who were there to purchase the necessaries of life; there was written upon almost every face a tragedy. Many of these shoppers were wives and mothers compelled to keep their purchases within the limits of the breadwinner's income.

The burden has fallen with greatest force upon the men who work for wages, the salaried man and woman, including teachers and ministers; also upon professional men. What the disease is we well know; but the question is, What caused it and why is it not remedied?

Mr. Speaker, to those of us who have "eyes to see and ears to hear" the cause is well known, and the reason why the cause is not removed is equally well known. That cause is the profiteer. The profiteer in time of war has become the profiteer in time of peace. Congress can not help the situation; its function is to make the laws; the Executive alone has the power to enforce them. No legislative body on the earth ever gave to a head ruler, by comprehensive law, more power than Congress has given unto President Wilson. No monarch that has sat upon a throne was ever clothed with any greater authority than that with which our President was and still is invested. The war, in legal theory, has not ended. The Lever Act, which gave the President unlimited authority as respects food and fuel, including price fixing and prosecution of profiteers, is still in force.

Last summer, after the Congress had been in session almost continually for four years, the Members voted to take a short recess in order to get a much-needed rest and to return to their homes and find out the views of their constituents upon public questions. Upon being informed that this had been done the President, without consultation with Members of the House, and, as I am told, not even with the minority leaders, demanded that the Members stay in session to pass a law, which he later recommended in his message, giving the Attorney General more power in relation to the prosecution of profiteers in the necessaries of life. The House of Representatives reversed its action, and the Congress stayed in session and enacted into law the measure referred to, notwithstanding the Members thought that the President and his Attorney General had already on hand statutes broad enough to send every profiteer in this broad land to prison. Armed with the old law and the new law, the latter written by his own hand, what did the Attorney General do? Nothing; practically nothing! In the words of one of the Senators, "the Attorney General has set a few mouse traps when he should have been setting bear traps." Flying the black flag of piracy, with their felonious fingers in the pockets of the people, the profiteers have plied their trade unmolested and unafraid. Not only has there been a lack of prosecution of profiteers, but the opportunity for their successful operation in holding up and gouging the people has been created by the administration, as I shall now proceed to show.

Among the factors contributing to the high cost of living there has been mentioned the fact that, by reason of the war, large bodies of men had been consuming and not producing. I concede the proposition to be true. Again, that there is an inflation of the currency, which proposition is likewise true, but this is a condition the administration could have remedied if it had wanted to. We have one case of where a reserve bank rediscounted for a member bank paper in volume ten times equal to the member bank's capital. The purchasing power of the dollar has become very weak. A dollar will now only buy about one-third of the commodities that it could have bought four years ago. The Government should stop its printing presses and call in some of its regional bank currency.

But what to my mind is the one great reason for the high cost, the one that affords the profiteer his opportunity to rob the people, consists in the fact that heads of departments and of bureaus in the Government, by "policies"—administration programs—relating to the disposition in France and the refusal to dispose of in this country, of military supplies, have guarded and protected the profiteer while he committed his depredations by extorting from the people an outrageous price for everything the people had to buy.

The Government, not knowing how long the war would last, undertook to lay in a large supply of practically everything the country produced, and the buyers went out—some of them losing their heads—and bought up what was in many, if not in most, cases the total national production, with the result that when the armistice was declared there were on hand billions of dollars worth of food and other supplies. Had the Government officials released these supplies at reasonable prices to the public that action would have put the profiteer out of business.

Again, the profligacy and, in many cases, almost if not wanton waste of supplies has contributed to the artificial shortage.

Mr. Speaker, I have not the time to dwell upon this phase of the matter, but I trust I may be pardoned for referring to a few cases—out of a thousand cases just as bad—particular instances which clearly show how the profiteer has been protected and the people punished by the so-called "policies" of the administration.

At the conclusion of the war the Army had on hand, in France, 22,000,000 pounds of sugar, 74,000,000 pounds of bacon, 6,000,000 pairs of shoes, and nearly 2,000,000 blankets. These are only a few of the things that were turned over to the French. The money value of the articles so sold amounted to $259,000,000 for food, $323,000,000 for clothing, $310,000,000 for automobiles, and $352,000,000 for hospital supplies. The total value of the goods delivered to France was $2,000,000,000. The price paid by France was $400,000,000. We therefore got 20 per cent, or one-fifth of their value, for these staple articles.

In ascertaining the values as above given the War Department made an allowance for depreciation, disregarding the fact that since the goods were bought the prices had greatly enhanced in value. The dock supplies and much permanent improvement were thrown in for good measure.

In addition to the goods sold—practically given away—in France, the War Department had on hand in the United States the following supplies: 38,536,000 pounds of bacon, 39,000,000 pounds of roast beef, 36,000,000 pounds of corned beef, 42,000,000 cans of tomatoes, 39,000,000 cans of baked beans, 20,000,000 cans of corned beef hash, 42,000,000 cans of string beans, 38,000,000 cans of corn, 32,000,000 cans of peas, 27,000,000 pounds of sugar, 5,250,000 pounds of oleomargarine, and 1,250,000 pounds of butter. This enormous supply of foodstuff the War Department purposed at first to dispose of in Europe, the Secretary claiming that there was "only a limited market in the United States." Congress, however, passed a resolution to the effect that these goods be disposed of in the United States. A few of the goods have been put on sale, and in small quantities dribbled out, at high prices, at certain points in such manner as not to affect "the stability of the market."

The foreign sales were under the management of Hon. C. W. Hare, director of sales, who, under the Secretary of War, was drawing a salary of $25,000 a year until Congress cut it down to $12,000. I omitted to say that Hare sold at a very low price a large supply of foodstuffs and clothing to the Belgians. Of the clothing so sold may be mentioned 22,000 overcoats, 412,000 trousers, 500,000 shoes, 165,000 leggins, 1,100,000 heavy socks, and 36,000 coats.

Had Congress not intervened, the entire Army supply would have been sent to Europe, and there sold or given away in order to avoid the effect of turning these goods loose upon the American market and the breaking up of the game of the "gentlemen" who are now gutting the American people.

The War Department, having generously sold to the French sugar and bacon, beef and corn and beans at 20 cents on the dollar, might at least have sold similar goods to the American people at the same figure.

I must close, but before doing so let me speak of one other article—shoes. The father who has to provide shoes for a half dozen children knows that something is wrong, and that he is being denied relief. The cause of his grievance is due first to the action of the War Department in buying up all the leather in the country and the making of nine saddles for every Cavalry horse; and, secondly, to the failure of the Attorney General to prosecute importers, manufacturers, jobbers, and others whose profits, in many cases, for a single year were sufficient to equal the capital employed.

For the reasons I have assigned the United States Railroad Labor Board should act with all haste possible.

Association of Producers of Agricultural Products.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON H. WELLING,

OF UTAH,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize the association of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the pending bill. The opponents of the bill have failed to show that its enactment will injure any proper business interest in the country.

The foundation of all our prosperity depends upon the agricultural happiness and well-being of our people. The farmers of America are its most indispensable asset. They represent our surest protection against unsafe thinking and radical action. The red flag of anarchy and discontent does not and will not fly from the homes of those who own and cultivate the soil.

It has been asserted that these men will combine to charge an extortionate price for farm produce. I think it will have the opposite effect. One of the chief elements to-day in the high cost of farm products to the consumer is the multiplicity of transactions between the point where the food is produced and the ultimate consumer.

The individual producer to-day who offers the products of his farm to the market has very little to say about the price he shall receive. He immediately becomes the victim of a group of speculators, who assemble what he offers for sale with what his neighbors offer of a similar sort, and these men who produce nothing proceed to juggle the market and charge the consumer much more than he would pay if he conducted his business with the farmer or the representative of the cooperative farm organization. Whenever an individual farmer seeks to sell his products he meets in the market place the representatives of vast aggregations of organized capital, that always determine the price of his products.

The products of the farm are usually perishable, and the individual farmer has not the facilities by himself alone of reaching the consumer before his products have spoiled. Nobody realizes this so well as the forces who, with abundant capital, have organized their business to take every advantage of the farmers' need in this regard. The remedy lies in permitting and encouraging the farmers to cooperate in building storage facilities for the protection and preservation of their products until they can ship them to the markets direct and thereby eliminate the waste and added expense now involved in our present expensive methods of distribution.

I belong to the largest and most successful cooperative farm organization in my State to-day. Its influence has always been helpful to the farmers and also to the consumers of the products of the farm.

It is the most helpful agency in the county in which it is located in stabilizing the price of farm products and educating the farmer in obtaining a just and fair return upon the capital he has invested and the industry and thrift he has practiced.

While this bill confers on farmers certain privileges, it can not properly be said to be class legislation. Business corporations have under existing law all the powers and privileges sought to be conferred on farm organizations by this bill. Instead of granting a class privilege, it aims to equalize existing privileges by changing the law applicable to the ordinary business corporations so the farmers can take advantage of it. Instead of granting to farmers a special privilege, it aims to take from the business corporations a special privilege by conferring a like privilege on farm organizations. It is no answer that farmers may acquire the status and secure the rights of a business corporation by deeding their farms to a corporation. That is neither practical nor desirable from any standpoint. Without doing that they can not associate themselves together for the mutual profit of the members without being threatened with prosecution.

The Par-Check Clearing System.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. P. NELSON,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief, plain, and businesslike statement as to the par-check collection proposition, for, as many of you know, I have been a country banker for a long period of years. I am now president of two State banks in the rural districts of my home State, and one of these banks is a member of the Federal Reserve System.

This exchange charge under discussion is the result of a bad practice begun many, many years ago. In the early days and up to even within 15 to 20 years ago it was customary for people in the smaller sections to purchase a bank draft at the bank to pay bills for merchandise, and so forth, bought in the centers; but as competition grew between the banks in the rural districts, and as the bankers cultivated and invited bank accounts subject to check, it was customary in the solicitation between the banker and his customer to say, "Open up an account with us, and your check on our bank will be just as good at the county seat or in the city as your check would be drawn upon the bank in the larger places." And in this way the smaller banker drew to his own counter bank accounts that might have gone to larger centers. Then it developed that these checks drifting to the centers would come around through city correspondent banks by letter to the bank upon which they were drawn and the bank would then impose a charge—sometimes more, sometimes less—many banks making it as much as they thought the city bank would stand. Of course, you understand, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the depositor who gave the check originally knows nothing about this charge. He supposed when he made the check and paid the bill that the one who received the check would get 100 cents upon the dollar, and up to this time, generally speaking, he still thinks so.

The country banker securing this exchange or fee, having had this privilege for so long a time, naturally thinks he is entitled to it and dislikes to give it up. The city bank does one of two things—it either absorbs the charge made and charges this fee to expense and forgets it, because they want to keep the country banker's favor and deposit account, or else he bravely and justly charges it to the man who deposits the check—wholesaler, jobber, or whoever else he might be. The wholesaler or jobber will either absorb it, like the banker did, or else he will add it to the next bill of goods that goes out and will collect it in that way. In the long run, Mr. Speaker, it comes out of the public in one way or the other. Therefore, the question at point is whether this is a just charge or not. For my part, I believe it is a situation evolved from a bad practice, and am in full accord with the Federal Reserve Board and Federal reserve banks in their effort to clear this situation up in as quick and just a manner as possible, so that these checks given may circulate without any charge as freely as possible to expedite commerce and to impede as little as possible what I choose to call the main circulating currency medium of our country.

In round numbers, the total actual money of all kinds circulating in this country at the present time is about $7,000,000,000. The total deposits in the national banks of the United States are around $16,000,000,000 and in the State banks around $22,000,000,000, the grand total deposits in all banks of the country being about $37,500,000,000. It will, therefore, be seen by this brief, plain statement of actual existing facts that the checks upon bank accounts constitute over five-sixths of the circulating medium of the country as it relates itself to bank accounts.

Anything that can be done to annihilate time and distance as well as cost in the transfer of funds between points in this country is not only a great but a real service to our commercial and economic life.

The marked increase during the past year in the volume and amount of checks cleared through the Federal reserve banks shows that member banks are depending more and more upon the facilities afforded by the Federal reserve banks. The daily average number of items handled by the Federal reserve banks during the 30 days ending December 15, 1919, was 1,412,737, as compared with a daily average during the same period in 1918 of 912,752, and the daily average during the entire 12 months of the year of 1919 was 1,110,791, as against 612,731 during the year 1918. For the monthly period between November 16 and December 15, 1919, the daily average amount represented by the items handled by all Federal reserve banks was $631,650,320, as compared with $524,407,631 for the same period in 1918. The daily average value of items increased from about $190,000,000 in 1917 to $420,980,209 in 1918 and $524,960,916 in 1919, an increase of nearly 25 per cent during the year 1919 as compared with the year 1918.

Quoting from the annual report of the Federal Reserve Board, I desire to remind you gentlemen of the House that the Federal Reserve System, in the gold-settlement fund, made up of deposits of the Federal reserve banks, now in deposit in Washington, cleared between the 12 districts of our country in 1919 about $74,000,000,000 and the intradistrict clearings on transactions within the districts themselves was in the neighborhood of $135,000,000,000. We have heard a good deal about what would constitute a minimum charge, namely, one-tenth of 1 per cent, and you can readily understand that if this charge had been made upon these transactions last year that some one would have had to pay a sum of at least $135,000,000, based upon this charge.

I do not care to go into the discussion as to who ought to pay this, but wish to state here emphatically that I believe that the Federal Reserve System has performed one of the greatest services in the handling of finance that this country has ever seen and has made a distinct step in advance as to the check-clearing program.

In my judgment it would have been impossible to have performed our task during the great World War and to care for our own extraordinary needs if it had not been for the operation of the Federal Reserve System. It has proven its ability to expand under these unusual conditions, and we are now going through the experience of a contraction or deflation so important to return to a normal condition. Personally, I have the utmost confidence that the system will function and prove its ability to meet all the complex economic and financial conditions under which we live at the present time. We should give our first attention to some of these situations incident to this important matter rather than to the details that have been presented to us by a small minority of the banks of our country. I have listened with interest to the hearings before the committee and have heard nothing from the bankers as to an appreciation of the position they occupy with the public. Many of them do not seem to appreciate that they are quasi-public institutions, that the people are depositing money with them, and in making their checks and sending them all over the country they create what is called in the banking business a tremendous "float," and all the time these bankers are lending these deposits out at 6, 7, and 8 per cent. These checking accounts, you understand, do not draw interest like savings accounts, and to my mind they ought to be very glad and willing to remit for these checks without charge.

By way of suggestion, as a practical proposition I trust that the Federal Reserve Board and Federal reserve banks will create at the earliest possible date in all the States many clearing districts. I mean by that that in any city where any considerable number of bank accounts are kept that the banks of that city will cooperate with the Federal Reserve System in establishing a clearing district and by use of the telegraph make their clearings nightly at the Federal reserve bank of their district. I believe that something of this kind would bring about the annihilation of two days or more of the checks in this "float." For instance, in my own State the city of La Crosse could be used as a clearing center for at least 125 banks, in the capital city of Madison perhaps 70 banks, and at Grand Rapids 40 or 50, and in other points like Superior, Wausau, and Green Bay, wherever any considerable number of banks keep their accounts, every effort should be made to create clearing districts. I believe also that this would be the means of lifting a great burden from the Federal reserve banks in the operation of their transit departments. It would be mutually helpful in bringing about adjustment of the present very vexatious exchange problem.

When that has been worked out and accomplished then, Mr. Speaker, every city bank should be compelled to credit on receipt and collect at par all items sent them on all points, because most of the city banks can utilize the Federal Reserve System in their clearings and ought to be able to participate in the telegraphic advices. In any event the city banks, because of the tremendous float out against them, ought to be willing to do their part. It is not only incumbent upon the country banker but is even more so upon the city banker to expedite this matter of the collection of checks. That is one of the causes of the grievance of the small country banker, that the city banker is getting the larger and greater benefits and at the expense of the country banker. The city banker being close to the Federal reserve bank can use the system more freely and quickly than the country bank in the outlying district can. They can absorb and hide, if necessary, some of the charges that they make, which the country banker can not do. Therefore I wish to contend, Mr. Speaker, here to-day that in order to expedite the clearings and to cut down time and distance and expense the Federal Reserve System might well establish the clearing points in each State where any number of country bankers are now keeping reserve accounts and might develop a par clearing system, a little more neighborly and a little closer to all the smaller or country banks, which would cut down the time of credit of clearings from one to three days. The Federal Reserve System might absorb telegraph and postage charges necessary to expedite these collections, bringing about the debits and credits necessary so that the city banker could, as I have suggested above, practically eliminate the charge he is making on some of his customers and because of the much larger amount of items out against him in the float of the country put everything upon a par basis in his bank as received. Of course, there may be some trifling losses here and there. There will always be in any considerable transaction of this kind and magnitude, but the banker ought to be willing to absorb this for the general good and efficiency of the service to the public. From figures which I have obtained from the Federal Reserve Board, as of date April 15, including nonparring branches of banks and private bankers, the reports disclose that there are in the United States 2,167 banks upon which the Federal reserve banks can not collect at par, either directly or through agencies. Of the above total the fifth (Richmond) district shows 786, divided as follows:

North Carolina	456
South Carolina	330

The sixth (Atlanta) shows 1,210, divided as follows:

Alabama	199
Florida	132
Georgia	529
Louisiana	101
Mississippi	106
Tennessee	143

The eighth (St. Louis) shows 60, all in the State of Mississippi. The twelfth (San Francisco) shows 111, divided as follows:

Arizona	20

It will thus be seen that out of approximately 30,000 independent banks of the United States there are only 2,167 banks that are not upon what is called the "par check" list. When you realize that under our system of banking, where every banker is independent, we have very little of the branch banking system, you will see that this is a remarkable achievement. It is a most difficult task to secure the cooperation of all these independent units in this way. Unless it shall be done by the Federal Reserve System in some real effective, efficient way it never can be done. Therefore we should give our best attention to improving this system and not tear down or disturb what has already been accomplished. I am satisfied that the smaller bankers of our country will cooperate as they have in every other movement of this kind, as was evidenced by their patriotic and enthusiastic support of our country during the stress of the war, if the city banks will give their cooperation and not insist upon some of the charges and practices that they now are insisting upon.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as I have tried to state in this simple, plain, matter-of-fact way, I desire to go on record as being opposed to any bill or any amendment that will insist on all the banks of the country going back to the old system of exchange charges on checks, which, taken as a whole, is a step backward in our banking operations. We have made too much progress and have accomplished too much to take any such backward step now. Only two possible solutions are open to us, Mr. Speaker. One is for the approximately 3,000 nonmember banks to join the other 27,000 banks in the par-check clearing system and place the entire banking system of America, as it ought to be, on the par list. The other is for all banks, both member and nonmember banks—State, National, and private—to make a certain scheduled exchange charge. Personally, I certainly hope, Mr. Speaker, that all our banks—private, State, and National—will have the forward vision and all go on the par-check clearing system. The banks owe it to the depositing public, whose interest they primarily should serve—as well as their stockholders—to make all checks clear at par everywhere within our national borders. But we must insist on the square deal to all banks, and treat large and small banks, country and city bankers, alike.

The Army Reorganization Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. ANDREWS,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, May 28, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, as we now have quite definite figures as to the size of the standing Army authorized by the reorganization bill, we can approximate its cost.

The Secretary of War, on behalf of the Federal administration, submitted estimates and recommendations for an Army of 576,000 enlisted men and 28,000 officers. Under existing conditions the annual cost of an Army of that size would be $1,152,000,000. The administration also insisted upon the adoption of universal compulsory military training, which would have added several hundreds of millions of dollars more to the expenditures of the Regular Army.

When asked why so many enlisted men and officers would be required, the Secretary and Chief of Staff replied that 275,000 to 300,000 men would be needed in Europe to enforce our obligations under the League of Nations. This point is emphasized anew by the recent official request made by the President to Congress for authority to accept a mandate for Armenia. The granting of that request and the assumption of such a mandatory would necessarily require national and military forces sufficient to control the Turkish Empire. Nothing but real physical force would be sufficient to maintain order and enforce law in the land of the Turks.

An Army on foreign soil would be much more expensive than it would be at home. Thus it is clearly disclosed that the Federal administration desired to reorganize the Army and conduct compulsory training that would have required at least $2,000,000,000 per year.

The Republican Congress replied to those demands by authorizing in its Army reorganization bill a standing Army of 280,000 enlisted men and 17,800 officers. The annual cost of an Army of 280,000 enlisted men will be approximately $560,000,000. Thus it appears that the Republican Congress has given to the country a standing Army that will cost less than the proposed Democratic Army by $592,000,000, to which must be added the hundreds of millions of dollars that would have been required for compulsory military training. This is practical retrenchment.

These figures illustrate the measure of difference between the requirements to maintain an autocracy and the appropriations that will be needed to support a Republic, which we intend to restore on the 4th of next March.

Let those who appear as counsel for the defense of the administration explain the reasons for their excessive demands made with respect to a standing army.

The various bills that have been proposed for the establishment of compulsory military training would require a very large increase of Federal expenditures each year.

Our military and naval resources are fully adequate to existing needs. The armies and navies of the Central Powers were overthrown and destroyed in the recent war. The nations of Europe have been pressed to the verge of bankruptcy.

Nation building must be the occupation of the European countries for a long time to come. In view of such conditions there is no necessity for compulsory military training in this country at present. Instead of increasing our annual expenditures, we should reduce them as rapidly as possible. A retrenchment in our expenditures is absolutely necessary to the reduction of taxation, which ought to be brought about without undue delay.

It will be necessary to expend vast amounts of money in caring for the disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines of the recent war. That duty is first and imperative. Some wise provision should be made soon to restore in part the losses sustained by those who were called to the colors during the recent World War. Before beginning to spend billions more to prepare for an imaginary war we should do something for the boys who won the last war. If a bill should be brought before the House to establish compulsory military training, I will vote against it. I will do all I can to reduce expenditures and thus prepare for a reduction in taxation.

All the energies of our people should be directed as urgently as possible to the tremendous task of reconstruction. We have done our part during the period of the war and now our domestic affairs should be restored as speedily as possible to healthy, normal conditions. The millions of young men who served our country so valiantly during the period of the war are passing back into the avenues of business life and should receive every possible encouragement and assistance.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CALEB R. LAYTON,

OF DELAWARE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is known as House bill 13931 and has for its object the authorization of the producers of agricultural products to organize for their own protection and benefit. I shall not detain the House long in presenting my views on this bill. I deem it my duty, however, to declare them.

As I conceive it, there is no special privilege granted in this measure. The only purpose is to restore to the farmer a natural right which the antitrust law is regarded as depriving him of. If there be any special privileges at all there should be a special privilege for the farmer before any other class of men. But there is no special privilege. The farmer seeks only to be allowed a natural right which every class of people enjoy and employ every day. Physicians get together all over the land in their various communities and establish fee bills. Lawyers do the same. Banks raise and lower as they please their discount rates. The manufacturer has his association in which he establishes the wholesale price of his products. The retailer everywhere has the same cooperative association. Stripped of all regulations, it is a primary and sensible thing to do for any class engaged in any particular enterprise. It has been the common-sense course pursued by men in every calling. The fact is the farmer in this country has been remiss for generations in not organizing, as all other occupations have done, and in consequence he has come to be regarded as one who should not organize and receive the benefits from such cooperation.

It has only been a few years, especially since the war began, when the farmer received anything commensurate with his risk, his labor, and his investment. The present price of his production depends upon an inadequate supply, occasioned by the shortened production of the world.

A few years ago the average farmer in the United States was the most hopeless and poorly paid of any man in the country. The man who dwells in a city, rides in his limousine, robes himself in his finely spun garments, and who works for eight hours a day, or even the laboring man engaged in the various industrial pursuits, who gives eight hours to labor—neither of them has any conception of a farmer's life with its unremitting toil and constant risk. The farmer takes his chances with storms and hail and frost and drought. He has little or no protection against the ravages of insects or of disease in his poultry or his cattle or sheep or hogs. After toiling for months he may see the whole fruit of his labor destroyed by a single storm.

Hitherto, whatever he grew some other power fixed the price of his crops. The commission merchant robbed him and the retailer profited selfishly from him. On the other hand, when he went to market to buy himself the things he needed the merchant fixed the price of the things the farmer bought and the manufacturer that of his plows, his harrows, his mowers, and his reapers, and every implement that he employed on his farm. And so with the manufacturer of his fertilizer. Everything he bought he had to pay a price fixed in advance by some one else. Everything he sold of his own production some one else fixed the price which the farmer was compelled to take, the price fixed by another than himself. It was a poor game, in which he generally got the worst end of the bargain. It has only been by reason of the automatically high prices growing out of the World War that he has begun to realize a proper profit from his pursuit. The time has gone by when the farmer will be content with a state of affairs in which the value of the productions of his labor shall be determined by other people, while he himself takes the price as fixed by others. He is no longer content to be put in the class of boobs, to be looked down upon as the menial class of our national life, a man fit only for raising the foodstuff and the material for clothing.

He does not demand a Shylock share, but does want—and should have—more of the values of his productions than he has been receiving. He does not want to raise potatoes for a dollar a barrel and see the retailer of this city get 30 cents a peck for those same potatoes. I have witnessed this fact right here in this city before the war. The potatoes in question were grown at Norfolk, with the Potomac River flowing to the very doors of the consumer, making the cheapest transportation in the world. And yet the grower received a dollar a barrel and some one else $2.60.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen may talk and insinuate that this bill is class legislation and, upon academic lines, oppose it, but the fact is there are other special laws upon our statute books called class legislation; and I only desire to say that if this bill is to be defeated, then in all justice those other statutes should be repealed. But, Mr. Speaker, let us get the true view of this matter—a proper perspective—so that the natural as well as the righteous proportions of the subject may be clearly discerned.

From the beginning of time, when "Adam delved and Eve span," the sons of the soil have been the great conservators of human life. If a nation ever died, it was always by conquest or by the failure of its agriculture. The bosom of our mother, the earth, is the source of all our basic natural strength, and has been so for every people upon the earth who ever arrived at power and distinction. From her generous bosom flow the indispensable provisions for man; from her we get food; from her we get clothing for our bodies; from her the material for what we call home—the house of shelter. Without her provisions we would starve, freeze, and go shelterless. Personally, I yield to the man who tills the soil the first place in the ranks of man's nobility. Without him we would all perish, though we had the gold of a Golconda and the gems of a Kimberley.

> Out in the storm, with its cold, icy breath
> Bringing you nearer and nearer to death,
> What, man, is your gold, though piled high and higher,
> Compared to the warmth of a sheltered fire?

And I venture to predict, Mr. Speaker, that if the time ever comes in our national life when the farmer is regarded as a lower order of man, if he is looked upon as worthy merely of a contemptuous consideration, and carelessly esteemed as a factor in our national life and stability, that time will mark the hour when this Nation begins its downward course to extinction.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill with not only a clear conscience but a satisfied judgment. I see in it a fine purpose and beneficial results. I believe that through the association and the cooperation which this bill will permit the farmer to make there will follow not only a greater intelligence in the handling of his production but an uplift to the pursuit, and in this way check the course of that dangerous stream which now flows from the farm to the cities. Something must be done whether in this way or in some other to make pastoral life more attractive than the wide, white way of our cities and towns, and I believe that this bill is the beginning of that very desirable result.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. AYRES,
OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I am not as favorably impressed with this measure as I am with what is known as the Capper-Hersman bill, but I have long since learned that in this body you can not get legislation just as you would like it, and have to take the best you can get. It is better, I hope, than no legislation at all. I am ready to do anything within reason to encourage agriculturists and to check, if possible, the abandoning of the farm for the city.

Experience, as well as statistics, teaches us that practically every city of any consequence in most any section of the United States is overcrowded; and by reason of this, living conditions are almost intolerable; but notwithstanding this, people continue to pour into the cities. This increase is not due to immigration from foreign lands but from the farms. Higher wages and shorter hours have lured not only the farm hand but many young farmers to the city, and to such an extent it is alarming.

There has been a prevelant idea for some time among city folk that the farmer is growing rich, that he is one of the profiteers. That this is a mistaken idea needs no better evidence than that the urban population is rapidly decreasing while the city population is fast increasing. There is no mistake that the farmers are not now making money. This is due to a number of causes, some of which can not be remedied by legislation, but some could no doubt by good State laws, and if need be by national laws.

We can, by legislation, bring about a condition of economy of distribution of farm products, which means greater profits to the farmer and cheaper food to the consumer. To bring about such results means organization on the part of the farmers, and also all the assistance that can be given by both State and National Governments.

When I was a member of the Post Office Committee I offered an amendment to the appropriation bill to provide sufficient funds to enable the Post Office Department to establish and operate enough motor-vehicle routes to thoroughly demonstrate what could be done by the Government in delivering produce direct from the producer to the consumer, but it was defeated and the department was compelled to operate on a very small scale, but to such an extent, however, as to show that the producer gets far more for his produce and the consumer gets it for much less than he could otherwise.

For instance, on the 26th of August, 1919, a truck load of cantaloupes, consisting of 75 crates, was brought from Easton, Md., to Washington, a distance of 107 miles, at a cost of transportation of $21.44. The total postage derived from that trip was $50.25, a net gain for the Post Office Department of $28.81. These cantaloupes were sold to the consumers here at 5 cents each. At that time such cantaloupes were retailing at 15 cents and 18 cents each. This transaction saved the consumers here in Washington about $390, gave the producer a better price, and the Government lost nothing, but gained a little.

October 16, last, a truck load of eggs, consisting of 64 crates, was brought to Washington from Warsaw, Va., 248 miles' transportation, at a cost of $30.70. The total postage derived by the department was $39.68. These eggs were sold to the consumer for 57 cents per dozen, while eggs were selling here at retail for 70 cents per dozen. I could give many more incidents of this kind, but what is the use? As long as express companies and railroads are able to convince statesmen it would be foolish and a tremendous loss for the Government to embark in such an enterprise, it will never be done.

A lot of fellows had to be educated that parcel post would be a great blessing to the people. The express companies and railroads contended it would not, and a lot of Congressmen had to be defeated before it could be demonstrated. The same might be said of the rural-route system. It takes time, if nothing else, to educate some men. This will come about some day. In the meantime something else will have to be done; that is, a law permitting the producers to sell collectively their produce without danger of prosecution.

Those from large cities opposing this kind of legislation ought to take a broader view of the matter. You forget that the farmer can not at this time compete with the factory and other institutions in the city in bidding for labor, and this is intended to equip him so that he can. I do not think you need to fear the farmer will form a trust, but he must organize for the purpose of enabling him to market his produce on a paying basis or cease to do business. It is not fair to presume he will continue to do business at a loss, and he is not going to do it, either. Just for this reason many are quitting, as heretofore stated, and many more will quit, and the sooner some of you fellows here in the East get out of your heads the foolish idea that you have to oppose all legislation advocated for the benefit of the farmer the sooner you will bring about a condition, I hope, at least, that will prevent bread lines and hunger riots in your cities.

This measure gives them the right to organize and do business as an organization. In the opinion of many good lawyers they have had this right under the Clayton amendment to the Sherman antitrust law; but owing to the fact some have been arrested under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, it is thought best to make this exemption clause specific by separate legislation.

I can see no objection to this, and was very much in hopes the Judiciary Committee of both the Senate and the House would report out the Capper-Hersman measure, which, I think, is preferable to the present measure; but I have discovered in this House, and especially in this Sixty-sixth Congress, you had better take what you can get and be glad to think you can get anything.

Farmers' organizations all over the country have passed resolutions calling for the passage of the Capper-Hersman bill. I have also received one or two sets of resolutions condemning the present or so-called Volstead act, but under the circumstances feel that we had better take it for the present and be glad that this much has been granted.

Senator CAPPER has done all in his power to have the Judiciary Committee of the Senate jar loose his bill, and Representative HERSMAN and his friends, of which I am one, have done all in their power to have the Judiciary Committee of the House do likewise, but to no avail. The best is the present measure, and if this will in the least take care of the matter let us take it. Of course, it is at the closing hour of the session and may never see daylight in the Senate but suffer the same fate as the Capper-Hersman measure; that is, get chloroformed in the Judiciary Committee—and sleep. But let us hope not.

Postal Service.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, there is no branch of the Government service that means more to the business interests of this country than the Post Office Department. Almost every activity in this Nation depends for its success on the efficient handling of the mail of this country.

Without going into the intricate details of this great and important service, it is sufficient to say that the efficiency of this department must be due to the high order of service rendered by the post-office clerks, railway clerks, and letter carriers.

It was a matter of common observation during the war that the post-office clerks and letter carriers were burdened to the limit of endurance in handling the vast volume of mail which the war created, together with the sale and delivery of war-savings stamps, for which they received no additional remuneration. They did this work with a spirit that won the admiration of the American people as a whole. And they did it although it required many hours of overtime, for which they received no extra pay.

In connection with the legislation now proposed I wish to submit a few facts which have been compiled by the United

National Association of Post Office Clerks, showing the compensation of post-office clerks and letter carriers compared with salaries paid for similar service in other fields of endeavor.

The average pay of skilled labor and mechanics in this country is 81 cents per hour. Whenever this class of workmen put in overtime they are allowed time and one-half. In many instances the rate of pay for this class of labor for work performed after 6 p. m. and prior to 7 a. m. is at the rate of time and a half. As a rule when skilled labor works after 12 o'clock noon on Saturdays double time is allowed, which is also true when work is performed on holidays and Sundays. There are many employers now who have arranged systems of profit-sharing and other forms of protection advantageous to their employees.

When we come to consider the post-office clerks and letter carriers we find that their average pay per hour is 48½ cents, but in no instance do they enjoy the benefits which are accorded to skilled labor. The post-office clerks and letter carriers when they work in excess of eight hours only receive the regular rate, and the same is true with reference to Saturday afternoons, holidays, and Sundays. There is no profit-sharing incentive to stimulate their interest, nor are they given the benefit of holidays for recreational purposes. It must be remembered, too, that they are not granted sick leave with pay, as is the case with other employees.

There is a very large responsibility resting on these men, and the highest form of service is demanded from them, not only by the business man but by every householder in the land. I am in favor of this measure because I believe it will hold many good men in the service and attract others to it. As a nation we can not afford to let this important service break down by any shortsighted policy that fails to recognize the value of the service rendered by these men and the necessity for paying them a compensation that will enable them to live, educate their children, and save money for the future.

One Hundredth Anniversary United States Botanic Garden.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. NELSON,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 8, 1920.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, May 8, 1920, marked the one hundredth anniversary of the United States Botanic Garden, located just west of the National Capitol in the city of Washington. A century ago the use of 5 acres of land was granted by Congress for a botanic garden. Later the area was extended so that at the present time the space devoted to both Botanic Garden and propagating purposes for public use is approximately 12½ acres. Of this, slightly more than 11 acres are included in the fenced area.

At the time the present site was selected, and even for many years thereafter, the garden was not the beauty spot that it is to-day. Most of the ground was low and marshy and exposed to the coming and going of the tides of the Potomac. Tradition has it also that the garden was the site of the early execution grounds of the city and that no less than five men were hanged there.

Up to the time the area now occupied by the garden was granted to the Columbian Institution for the Promotion of Arts and Sciences no effort had been made to develop the Mall as a park connection between the Capitol and the White House, as was originally intended, and which in time will no doubt be extended to the Lincoln Memorial, now nearing completion some 2 miles west of the Capitol. A number of years ago, in a movement looking to the restoration of the Mall to its original status, Congress paid the Pennsylvania Railroad $1,500,000 to remove its tracks.

Doubtless every visitor to the National Capital has enjoyed the Botanic Garden, especially in the summer season, but it is hardly probable that many are familiar with its history or know that it has frequently been a "bone of contention." Those who contend that the present location of the garden is inappropriate refer to the fact that the space was designed by President Washington and Maj. L'Enfant as an open approach to the Capitol. It is urged that it was not intended that this tract should be shut off by walls and fences as at present but should be subject to ornamentation and fountains. The location of the Grant Memorial, now after some 10 or 15 years nearing completion—it is to be hoped—was a step in this direction.

North of the main conservatory near the center of the garden is the famous fountain, sculptured by Augusti Bartholdi, which is described by many art students as the most beautiful in America. This was purchased by the Congress at the close of the Philadelphia Centennial (1878), where it had been on exhibition. The basin is 93 feet in diameter and the fountain throws a jet to a height of 65 feet. Spaced in the basin are a number of fancy sprays.

The fountain when in full play presents a beautiful effect, especially when reflecting the rays of the sun. It is wired with electricity, and, when lighted, presents a wonderful spectacle.

Owing to the limited supply of water and the necessity for conservation in lighting, the fountain has not been employed to its best artistic possibilities.

The greenhouses contain one of the finest collections of palms in the United States. This collection could not be replaced for many thousands of dollars. In fact, many of the palms are priceless. The greenhouses, however, are old and entirely inadequate and can not be properly heated. During the winter the palms and other plants for exhibition purposes have to be crowded into the houses and even piled on top of each other, rendering it impossible to show to advantage the really remarkable collection that has been gathered at great expense by the Government and by private contribution during the last 100 years.

In addition to greenhouses at least four times as large as those now in service, and of thoroughly modern construction, they should be heated from a central heating plant.

Permit me to call to your attention an editorial which appeared in the Agricultural News, a fortnightly review of the imperial department of agriculture for the West Indies:

> We have seen that botanic gardens in their origin were based on utility. This is perhaps the best distinction that can be made between their function and that of the public garden or park, where plants are grown primarily for purposes of ornament or shade. The essential difference is apt to become blurred, especially in the case of botanic gardens situated near to towns, and needs to be reemphasized from time to time. There is no reason why botanic gardens can not or should not be ornamental, but this should be strictly subsidiary to their main purpose.
> What, then, are the proper functions of a botanic garden, large or small, in the neighborhood of a great city or in a small tropical island? First, there is the scientific function. New plants are introduced from other climates and other lands, and these are grown and studied so as to discover whether they are capable of adaptation to their new surroundings and whether they are likely to be of value, economic or aesthetic.
> Second only, perhaps, to plant introduction should be the maintenance, so far as it is possible, of a representative collection of the more interesting and useful plants of the surrounding country, and especially of species allied to those in cultivation. The latter are of great interest to the taxonomist, to the plant breeder, and to the pathologist because of the likenesses and differences they exhibit in comparison with the species grown for use. In a cotton-growing island, for example, nothing could be more appropriate or more useful, so far as botanic gardens go, than a representative collection of the native cottons, many types of which are in process of extermination, owing to increasing strictness regarding close seasons. With them, it is quite conceivable, may be lost characters or qualities which would some day prove highly valuable.
> Again, botanic gardens afford botanical students opportunity for research in plant biology and pathology. One can hardly place a limit to the benefits that agriculture and horticulture have derived and may derive from researches in this direction. Our modern science of genetics, for instance, is derived from the studies of Mendel in a monastery garden in the last century. By work on the lines indicated by his discovery races of useful plants are being multiplied and modified so as to be more exactly suited to the variable conditions in which economic plants are grown and to produce far greater crops than their ancestors. Studies which lead to such results can best be carried on in botanic gardens, where there ought to be found a greater amount of material and more scientific appliances than are possible in most private establishments.
> Besides the scientific function of botanic gardens, there is their educational aspect. In an article on this subject in Science it is well remarked that the notion that knowledge can be acquired from books is too prevalent; the idea that one can read about nature and thus acquire knowledge of nature is as misleading as to suppose that one can acquire knowledge of business by reading about business. We must distinguish between information and knowledge. Information may be obtained by reading, but knowledge can only be acquired by contact with and experience of realities. Hence botanic gardens open to the public a source of real knowledge of plants; and there is no more pressing problem to-day than to learn how to grow plants and how to grow them in increasing quantities and of increased value in every possible situation. If made without insight into plant nature, efforts in this direction pass through a period in which knowledge is acquired through painful experience, very often with failure as the ultimate result.

As indicating the interest taken by Senators and Members in the garden, Senator RANSDELL, during the memorial proceedings for the late Senator Broussard, said:

> He was extremely fond of flowers, plants, and trees. He paid frequent visits to the Botanic Garden in this city, claiming that it rested his mind and body to look at and study "plants that God put on this earth for our benefit as well as our pleasure." On one occasion, while admiring some orchids in company with his particular friend, George W. Hess, superintendent of the United States Botanic Garden, he placed his hands upon one of them and fondled it, saying, "To my mind there is nothing more beautiful in this world than a baby and a flower." He said of trees, "To love trees intelligently we must know them; we must be able to call them by name whenever and wherever we meet them. This is fundamental to any friendship."

Looking to a possible removal of the garden, various sites have been proposed. Rock Creek Park, containing 1,606 acres, in the northwestern suburbs of Washington, has been suggested. Another proposed site is Mount Hamilton. This tract, unfortunately, not accessible to many, fronts on the Anacostia River for a distance of about 9,000 feet, and contains 483 acres.

In advocating the Mount Hamilton tract it has been suggested by some that the Government would, following the purchase, then have ample grounds for experimental work, including the growing of various common vines, shrubs, and trees, largely fruit trees and berry-bearing vines. In answer to this, it may be said that the Government now has available the agricultural experiment farm, the tract at Rockville, Md., and hundreds of acres of reclaimed land in the Potomac flats.

We would look upon the destruction of the present garden and the removal to a site such as the Mount Hamilton tract as a serious mistake and inexcusable blunder, which many years and no reasonable sum of money could remedy. To convert the Mount Hamilton tract, much of it exceedingly rocky and poorly suited to the purpose proposed, into an ideal garden would cost more than the most optimistic can expect Congress to sanction. While we are not advised as to the purchase price of this land, it would probably be from $400 to $500 per acre, and even at these figures the large amount would represent but a beginning.

We see no urgent reason why the purchase of the Mount Hamilton tract, with a view to converting it into a great national botanic garden, should be urged at this time. If there is money available, some of it should first be spent in improving the present Botanic Garden. In this connection, I would suggest that the average Member of Congress, busy as he is, might well afford the time to visit this garden, enjoy its rare plants and flowers, and appreciate its possibilities. Once this is done all thought of removing the garden, starving it by inadequate appropriations, or destroying it by unfriendly legislation will cease.

It is true that when compared with the gardens of other cities and countries the Botanic Garden at Washington seems insufficient and is deserving of much more liberal support. The Royal Botanic Garden of Kew contains 288 acres. In addition, the 24 botanic gardens of the British Empire are closely associated and identified with Kew. Berlin has 1,325 acres in its botanic garden; Paris has 75 acres; Edinburgh has 58 acres; Glasgow 40 acres; Rio de Janeiro has 2,000. Shaw's Garden in St. Louis contains 80 acres and New York has 400 acres.

It may be said, though, that much that the National Botanic Garden in Washington lacks in size is made up in other ways. Here are many rare plants and historic trees. As far back as 1836 the naval appropriation act made provision for sending a surveying and exploring expedition to the Pacific Ocean and South Seas. This expedition consisted of six Government ships, which started out in 1838 and returned in 1842, bringing a large collection of natural history specimens which were later arranged and classified so as to be of the largest educational value. Specimens collected before and since that time have resulted in the assembling of a very rare and valuable collection of plants and trees. One of the largest single contributions came from the expedition of Commodore Perry to Japan. The visitor, as he is shown over the grounds, sees scores of historical trees. In the conservatory is an old date palm which from time to time has thrust its head through the skylight.

The geographical location of Washington and conditions as regards moisture and temperature are ideal for the growing of a very large proportion of the trees and plants native to America; hence it is especially desirable that a really national garden be provided for. Not everyone knows that there is danger of a great many of our once common trees and plants being entirely lost unless some special effort is made to save them. Then, too, the trees, shrubs, and flowers found growing wild in Maryland, Virginia, and bordering States should be preserved. Holly, once so plentiful and still comparatively abundant, is now ruthlessly destroyed at the holiday season. Dogwood, one of the most attractive of our profusely flowering forest trees, should be saved for future generations. The time may come when these among the most beautiful of our native trees will be very rare indeed. With the passing of these and all such berry-bearing trees and shrubs go the mocking bird and many other birds whose songs have added to the joy of living.

No recommendation looking to the removal of the National Botanic Garden, should such removal mean the destruction of the present garden, should be favorably considered at this time. Any attempt to change the location would result in the loss of rare trees, shrubs, and plants, many of which could not be replaced at any price. Some of these were years ago secured at great expense to the Government. This is notably true of the collection of palms and various other tropical trees and plants, the largest of which could not safely be removed. As everyone who knows anything about the difficulties to be experienced in moving even the hardiest of large trees, the attendant risk is always great. A number of years ago, when the miserably located Grant Memorial was agreed upon, it was necessary to remove one of the most famous trees—"the peace tree"—to another part of the grounds. This tree was successfully transplanted, but for the job the Government paid $5,000. This fee had been agreed upon with the understanding that if the tree did not live nothing was to be paid for the work. The tree referred to is but one of the many of great historic interest. On the grounds are trees planted by Lincoln, Jefferson Davis, and many others whose names are famous in America and abroad. Then, too, there are scores of rare trees famous for their unusual symmetry and beauty.

Still another objection to be urged against the removal of the Botanic Garden is that it would be inaccessible to thousands of people, especially the poor, cripples, and invalids who now enjoy it. One has only to take a trip through the grounds on any fair day in summer to verify the truth of this statement. Again, the average visitor who comes to Washington, even though his time may be very limited, is able to look in on the garden. While it is true that the grounds are far too small, this is no valid reason why the garden, in part at least, should not be continued in the present location. Additional acreage might well be secured in the immediate vicinity; then if a very much larger tract is needed for propagating and other purposes, it should be secured elsewhere.

The present garden, which is carefully looked after by Superintendent George W. Hess, needs but to be seen and studied in order to be appreciated. Mr. Hess, who was formerly connected with the Boston Public Gardens and who is recognized as one of America's leaders in his chosen profession, is a man of rare executive ability and possesses a genuine love for plants and flowers. It is Mr. Hess's ambition to see the United States Botanic Garden developed to be the best garden in the whole world; to be the model for others. To this end there must be more space, either by extending the garden in its present location or by providing more adequate grounds elsewhere.

In the proposed development and enlargement of the Botanic Garden the superintendent contemplates not only the establishment of an arboretum but also a botanical museum, if authorized by Congress, and he hopes to have provided an auditorium where weekly lectures can be given, and every advantage afforded to students of plant life in the National Capital. The superintendent is also anxious to have sufficient space so that practical gardening can be taught and where instruction can be given to school children in the best method of planting and caring for useful, ornamental, and other plants.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. W. LARSEN,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I ofttimes wonder whether the average citizen of this country realizes the efforts that are constantly being made to impose unjust burdens of taxation upon the masses of our people, and to deprive them of the God-given liberties to which they are entitled, and for which our forefathers bled and died upon crimson fields of battle.

When we review the legislation attempted in the Congress during the past few months, and consider that which is too often accomplished, we no longer wonder that discontentment exists throughout the length and breadth of this country. We no longer wonder that dissatisfaction prevails in almost every home. The wonder is that the people do not rise up in righteous indignation and demand removal from office the would-be assassins of liberty and free speech who pretend to legislate for their benefit.

Mr. Speaker, I realize the language which I use is strong, but I speak advisedly when I say it is true. If anyone doubts it, he has but to review the legislation recently presented and insisted upon in the Congress, especially the various bills culminating in H. R. 12775, which it is proposed shall constitute the military program of this Nation.

First, there was proposed a standing Army of more than 500,000 men, with about 36,000 officers. There was proposed a permanent conscription and compulsory military training system, which alone would have cost the Government $900,000,000 per annum. The proposed scheme, in the aggregate, would have cost $2,000,000,000 annually. Think of the outrage, gentlemen, that was not only proposed but insisted upon by leaders of the Congress.

The Wadsworth bill in the Senate, which received the sanction of that powerful branch of the Congress, not only contained a provision for permanent conscription, applicable to all wars and national emergencies, to be put into operation upon Executive order, without sanction of the Congress, but also a system of compulsory military training which would have taken the young men from every home, regardless of family conditions, individual or parental desire, and placed him into the Army for training. It sought to federalize the National Guard, and would have prevented the governor of any State from calling out the State troops without order from the President, no matter what emergency may have arisen.

All of this nefarious legislation would doubtless have become a part of the organic law of the land, except for the righteous indignation of public opinion, and the faithful service of a Democratic minority in the Congress.

But we will turn from attempts at legislation to actual accomplishments, and consider some of the provisions of the bill which those interested have succeeded in putting through both branches of the Congress.

The bill passed on Friday last week and forwarded to the President for approval creates an Army of 280,000 enlisted men, and, in round numbers, 18,000 officers—about 1 officer for every 15 men. In the name of God, what do we expect to do with so many officers? Has anyone suggested their legitimate use? Is it not a fact that the principal duty of many will be to sign the pay roll once a month and draw an unearned salary? By the provisions of the bill we shall have about twice as many officers as are necessary and as was ever heretofore permitted under permanent legislation of the Congress. The provisions of this bill under Government estimate make necessary an appropriation of approximately $500,000,000 per annum. Bear in mind this is for military purposes alone, and is exclusive of appropriation for the Navy.

But we will consider the measure a little further. We will refer to the Articles of War, the military law by which it is proposed to try any soldier who may be charged with a violation of rules.

Article 54 and those following and embraced in section 1 of said articles, generally speaking, provide that those convicted by court-martial shall be punished in the discretion of the court. It may be imprisonment for one day, for life, or it may be the death penalty; no one knows. No State would tolerate such laws to be enforced against those in civil life, and none would trust its officers, though elected by the people, with such wide discretionary power to punish violations of penal statutes.

Article 62 of said section provides that any officer who uses contemptuous or disrespectful words against the President, the Vice President, the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of War, or the governor or legislature of any State in which he is quartered shall be dismissed from the service and suffer such other punishment as a court-martial shall direct. It further provides that any person subject to military law—this includes the private soldier—who so offends shall be punished as a court-martial shall direct. This article, in my judgment, violates Article I of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in that it constitutes an abridgment of the freedom of speech. It not only violates the Constitution, but it is antagonistic to every principle of democratic government. Any private citizen may criticize the President, the Vice President, the Congress, or other officer named. Why should the soldier be deprived of the right? The Constitution makes no exception, and I do not believe our military forces have so conducted themselves in times of peace or on the field of battle that they should be denied this right. Under the provisions of this article it is possible that one may receive the death penalty for a mere utterance of words considered contemptuous or disrespectful to an officer. Surely the American people are not ready to give consent to the enactment of such law.

Under the provisions of article 64 express authority is given for the infliction of the death penalty upon one who wilfully disobeys any lawful command of his superior officer. No matter how trivial the offense, the penalty may be death. Surely the American people remember the depredations committed by tyrannical officers under the guise of military discipline and law enforcement upon private soldiers during the late war. May the God of our fathers deliver the Republic from such an evil day as will justify the enactment of such law.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SYDNEY ANDERSON,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following:

MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS BY HON. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN, OF NEW YORK, AT THE AMPHITHEATER, ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY, VA., MAY 31, 1920.

"To those who served their country in its hours of trial and dedicated their lives to uphold its honor, a grateful Nation has set apart this day in loving tribute to their memory. Three generations gather here to express their devotion to the glorious dead and to the cause for which they died.

"Nearly three score of years have elapsed since our beloved land was drenched in the blood of civil strife. Brothers faced brothers and bore the brunt of battle to uphold the principles for which they stood. Time has erased the animosities of the age in which their struggle culminated. The flag of our country, which was carried to victory by our forefathers at Yorktown, New Orleans, and Monterey, soon again became the cherished emblem of a united people. The wounds of ancient strife are healed, and to-day our united country shows no trace of the conflict which once divided it.

"Year by year, with constantly thinning ranks, the veterans of that great struggle gather upon this day to renew old memories and to pledge themselves anew to the flag for which their comrades died. Venerable fathers, we salute you! We love your gray hairs and watch your steps with true devotion. We revere your patriotism and admire your example. We pledge ourselves, as true Americans, to cherish the high ideals for which you made your sacrifices. May your lives, like noble barks upon a placid stream, pursue the even tenor of their course, floating gently onward to the goal amidst the plaudits of your countrymen.

"A generation passed, and the sons of those who settled their grievances by the hearty handclasp of Grant and Lee at Appomatox rallied with spontaneous ardor to carry the flag to victory at Manila and Santiago.

"Comrades of the Spanish War, you also we salute! Spurred by no spirit of sectional jealousy, animated by no strong personal or national grievance, but inspired only by sympathy for a people struggling to attain its freedom, you threw yourselves into the conflict to uphold the highest and noblest ideals of our Nation. Your courage and devotion made the struggle short. You can not crowd upon your banners the names of many battles; but those which your valor won will ever remain your country's proudest heritage.

"Another generation passed. Again the tocsin of war sounded and the sons of those who gave freedom to Cuba came trooping forward from all parts of our land to extend a helping hand to stricken Belgium. The fear and horror of militarism strengthened their arms, inspired their hearts, and spurred their souls to deeds of glorious devotion.

"When the World War burst like a thunderclap from a clear sky it brought in its wake all the barbarites of medieval warfare—cities and towns bombarded without notice; bombs dropped from the skies on churches, hospitals, and homes; hostages taken and killed for the infraction of tyrannous and captious rules of war; poison gas and flame throwers to scald, to choke, to burn, and to torture were used for the first time by so-called civilized nations. In short, paganism revived and murder rampant throughout a maddened world.

"This was the war in which you younger men of our day were called upon to take a part. And right valiantly you bore your burdens. Our entrance upon this great war found the foe flushed with success and the Allies almost in despair. Impatiently, for long months, our boys in khaki were kept behind the lines, training day by day for the great test when the signal should be given for them to measure their strength and courage with the foe.

"At last when Pershing gave the word like young lions unleashed they rushed into the line. Like adamant they stood against the human flood. From that instant the policy of the war was changed. A new factor had entered the fray, and the day for masterly retreats and orderly retirements passed away forever. The new order was onward, ever onward! Our beloved boys in khaki sprang forward at the call. The veteran Prussian troops gave way, beaten and discomfited. Columbia's sons proved themselves worthy of the best traditions of their sires and, by their deeds of valor, wrote in their blood the most brilliant page of American history.

"Veterans of sixty-one, comrades of ninety-eight, let us both unite in tendering the laurel to those worthy scions of our race. Let our heads be bowed in offering our tribute of respect and admiration to those sturdy men of our land whose bodies lie in hallowed graves upon the battle fields of France.

"Comrades of the World War, three generations salute you. The fates were kind at your birth in giving you the opportunity to take part in this historic conflict. You have added new prestige to the American flag and new glory to your country. Your names will shine among our Nation's heroes and serve as an inspiration for generations and generations of Americans yet to come. You have made the name of America revered and honored. Nations liberated by your valor and the sacrifices of your noble and heroic dead will record for all time your praises in their annals. You have confirmed our right to stand as the Good Samaritan among the nations of the world."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM D. BOIES,
OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 29, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, judging from some of the speeches made in opposition to this bill, one can not help but conclude that there are some men who are not aware that the food that nourishes their bodies and sustains their lives comes from the farms of this country. They are not aware that the business of farming is the largest and most important single industry on the face of the globe. They do not appear to appreciate the fact that all the real success of other lines of business are primarily dependent upon the success of the farmers. Perhaps no criticism should attach to these gentlemen from the great industrial centers of the East. They have no knowledge of farm produce except as they have seen it on the platter and come in contact with it at the end of a fork or the side of a spoon.

It would be of great benefit to these gentlemen, and really helpful to the country, if they would make a visit to the great Mississippi Valley and learn what farming is and where the materials for their meals come from.

We of the West have fed them so well and so regularly that they have come to regard the question of food supply as a sort of inheritance, and have forgotten all these years to remember the western farmer in their "return of thanks."

We invite you to come West and witness the farmer and all the members of his family working from 14 to 16 hours a day, 8 or 9 months of the year, in order to maintain themselves in a business way, and while so doing producing the food for the Nation.

If you will come and get this first-hand information, and it should ever occur again that anyone attempts to handicap agriculture by an infamous "daylight-saving law," you will have more consideration for the hand that feeds you than you have had in the past.

We know you have called us "hayseeds" and cartooned us in fantastic garb, with whiskers, chewing at a straw or a spear of grass. For this and some other things we have forgiven you long ago, because you do not understand that the western farmer is as far removed in personal appearance from that picture as the people of Massachusetts are from the belief in "witchcraft."

Seriously the farmer is only asking Congress to afford him the opportunity to transact his business in such manner as will allow him a fair return upon his invested capital and a reasonable recompense for the long hours of service he is required to give to his business. He can not succeed with an 8 or 10 hour workday, and anyone offering any such testimony is not a competent witness and can not qualify as such.

The farmers of this country are entitled to graduation from the class of mere delivery boys. They have been kept in fourth grade long enough and now demand the right to stand on an equal footing with all "big business," to have some say as to how and to whom they shall market their produce.

Whenever the farmer buys from the merchant, big or little, he has always been obliged to ask: "How much?" And he has paid the price. When he has had anything to sell he has been obliged to ask: "How much will you pay to-day?" And he has been required to accept. No other man, or class of men, stand in such business relation in this country at this time.

The farmer does not expect to unduly profit by the enactment of this law, nor does he expect that the cost to the consumer will be enhanced. But he does believe that this bill, if passed by Congress and signed by the President, will eliminate two or three fellows who have stood guard, in their own interest, interlopers if you please, along the pathway from the farmer to the ultimate consumer, and appropriated a good share of the profits that rightly belonged to the farmer. There never was any excuse for some of these "middlemen," except that they found it profitable—"easy money"—to appropriate a goodly per cent of the fish that the farmer had caught and strung, as it were, when the farmer's back was turned.

The farmer's business is not like that of any other kind. It is not of one kind, like the manufacturer of clothing or steel rails. The produce from the farm flows to the market every day in the year and meets in competition with the produce of millions of farmers from the four corners of the earth. If it were possible for the farmer to store his produce it would not avail him anything, because the transportation facilities are not sufficient, and never will be, to enable him to market his produce quickly at a time when he might have influenced the market by hoarding. One great drawback is that the farmer is suffering mightily on account of a woeful lack of facility to get his goods on the market. He is usually the last man to secure a hearing. Hunger is about the only thing that opens the avenues to him.

The farmer's advocates have not occupied positions through which legislative benefits might be secured at all in keeping with the advantages resulting from the efforts of men favoring the general business of the country.

It has been contended that the Secretary of Agriculture is clothed with too much power; that he is likely to unjustly favor the farmer. In the first place, no man in that position could afford to be unfair or neglect to do his duty; and, in the second place, it is hoped that the day has passed when any dishonest man can remain long in office.

The Nation Should Be Aroused to the Danger of Peyote.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY L. GANDY,
OF SOUTH DAKOTA,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, during the Sixty-fifth Congress the House passed a peyote prohibitory bill, but consideration thereof was not had in the Senate. That there was then and is now an urgent need for legislation on the subject is apparent to everyone who has given study to it. I have heretofore and in this Congress introduced legislation to prohibit the traffic in peyote, including its sale to Indians, introduction into the Indian country, importation and transportation, and providing penalties therefor. This legislation is urged by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the Anti-Saloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and scientists and publicists the Nation over.

Peyote or mescal is the button-shaped top of a cactaceous plant. Webster's Dictionary gives the following definition:

Mescal (meskal). [Sp. mezcal, fr. Mex. mexcalli.]

1. Either of two cactaceous plants of the genus Lophophora (L. lewinii and L. williamsii), having rounded stems or joints covered with ribbed tubercles, the tops being called mescal buttons from their appearance. The plant is used as a stimulant and antispasmodic, especially among the Mexican Indians, who also employ it as a mild intoxicant in various ceremonials. Its effect is said to resemble that of Indian hemp. Among the alkaloids extracted from mescal are anhalonine, mescaline, and pellotine.

2. A colorless intoxicating drink distilled in Mexico from the leaves of various species of Agave, or Maguey.

3. Any plant which yields the liquor. The mescal magueys are probably quite numerous; they have thinner leaves than this yielding pulque.

The Indians of Mexico have been using mescal, or peyote, for many generations. "Medicine men" among the tribes there long ago used mescal, or peyote, in certain superstitious or alleged religious ceremonies, and as time passed its general use spread. Sometimes the users chew the dry "button," and sometimes a drink is brewed much as tea is made. The use is habit forming and larger portions are required to produce the same effect as one becomes more and more addicted thereto.

From the Mexican border the use of peyote or mescal has gradually spread over all the Indian country. I do not want to be understood that in the North any large percentage of the Indians are addicted to this drug, but I want to make it clear that there are to-day many users of it on most every reservation in the country, and on some reservations practically all the adult members of the tribe are using it. Within the past few years its use has spread to the district in South Dakota which I have the honor to represent in the House, and the so-called religious ceremonies incident thereto seem to be a cloak for what among the whites would be referred to as a drinking party or a carousal. These affairs are attended by Indians of both sexes, and the records of the United States court in South Dakota in the case of Harry Black Bear will disclose in no uncertain language the real character of these peyote-consuming meetings. The Indian referred to was arrested and tried in order that it might be definitely determined whether there is any applicable law on the subject. Although there was no question but what peyote had produced intoxication, and the jury so found, the court held, on motion in arrest of judgment, that there is no law of the United States under which the defendant could either be punished for the use of peyote or mescal or for its introduction on the Indian reservation.

It is true many Indians apparently in excellent health will be pointed to in an effort to show that the use of peyote or mescal is not harmful. Doubtless those are the moderate users thereof. The excessive users show the full effects of the drug, as shown by the testimony in the Black Bear case. Enfeebled in mind and body, they pay the penalty for partaking of this poisonous substance which the Congress has not yet prohibited.

I have heard it argued that this drug is immune from prohibitory action by Congress because it is now often used in certain alleged religious ceremonies, but it takes a far stretch of the imagination to believe that the religion is based upon that article which is used in the "communion." Peyote would have to be the religion itself if it is to be sacred under that clause of the Constitution which guarantees freedom of religious worship. The plain truth is, this so-called religious use is a camouflage for the protection of this one intoxicating drug, the use of which among the Indians of the United States is not prohibited by statute.

Scientists who have investigated and studied mescal or peyote and its use tell of its harmful effects. The drug Lophophora Williamsii has been identified with the Aztec narcotic, the so-called "Sacred Mushroom," or Teonanacatl; also with the Peyotl Zacatecensis or the Devil's Root of ancient Mexico, and the "Mescal Buttons," of Texas. In recent times this drug has been carefully studied by chemists, and among them Heffter, who in 1896 obtained from the bean four alkaloids—anhalonine, mescaline, anhalonidine, and lophophorine. With three of these alkaloids extensive experiments have been made on various animals. The general effects produced by anhalonine include tremor, opischotonos, followed by convulsions, rapid breathing, and inability to move. Mescaline produces tremor, dilated pupils, violent convulsions, stiffening of extremities, opischotonos, rapid breathing, death. The third alkaloid produces restlessness, violent tremor, very rapid breathing, convulsive twitchings, tetanic convulsions, opischotonos, cessasation of breathing.

In order to ascertain its physiological and psychological actions, the whole bean has been eaten by many investigators. They have found that peyote dilates the pupils, slows the pulse, and weakens the heart action. There is muscular depression, sometimes so much that the subject is hardly conscious of having arms and legs. Time is lengthened; a minute is like an hour, and an hour is like a whole night. Things seem far away. Common sounds seem wonderful, so that one note struck on the piano seems like a whole chord. Each note produces a new series of wonderful colors. Clothed in these kaleidoscopic colors all kinds of animals and objects are seen, some beautiful and alluring, and some grotesque and fearful, but it is the colors constantly coming and going that make the most fascinating and satisfying appeal. Every intelligent person must realize that such violent sensations can be indulged in only at the expense of the mind and body.

Dr. Wiley, former chief chemist of the Agricultural Department of the United States, says of peyote:

It is an evil, and nothing but an evil.

Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, after thorough experimentation with himself, says:

I predict a perilous reign of this mescal habit when this agent becomes obtainable. The temptation to call again the enchanting magic will be too much for some men to resist after they have set foot in this land of fairy colors, where there seems so much to charm and so little to excite horror or disgust.

Dr. Richardson, of Denver, says of peyote:

So far as its results on the human economy are concerned, from a pathological standpoint, alcohol is altogether the safest and least harmful. The alcoholic subject may, by a careful system of dietetics, escape physical and mental weakness, but the mescal fiend travels to absolute incompetency. It is a vicious thing.

Havelock Ellis writes:

It has every claim to rank with hasheesh and the other famous drugs which have produced for men the joys of an artificial paradise.

Prof. Roswell P. Angier, of Yale, wrote to Robert D. Hall, whom he used for experimentation with the drug:

Peyote is deleterious in its influence, even in the small doses which you took. I have little doubt that in large doses the influence would be worse.

Prof. E. B. Putt, of the North Dakota Agricultural College and Government Experiment Station, writes:

I should not care to repeat the experiment with a dose exceeding four mescal buttons. The muscular paralysis is so complete that one might cease breathing, thus ending the experiment.

Such scientific evidence leads solely to the conclusion that peyote or mescal is bad for mind and body and is poisonous. The Nation should be aroused to the danger of the use of this cactus "button," which is now without the condemnation of law. In numerous localities the use is not confined to the Indians. To be effective any law which is passed must prohibit the traffic in this drug, including its sale to Indians or introduction into the Indian country, its importation into the United States—for a large part of the supply now used in this country is imported from Mexico—and its transportation either by mail or otherwise.

I beg your indulgence while I read you a clear, concise editorial on the subject from the Outlook.

Peyote, also called mescal buttons, is a cactus imported from Mexico. It produces results upon the user somewhat analogous to those produced by opium and by hasheesh. The few defenders of its use present three arguments against its prohibition:

1. That it has some medicinal uses, as opium has.

2. That it destroys the appetite for whisky. This is also questionable, the witnesses on this subject being about equally divided. But there is practical agreement that if it has such an effect the remedy is worse than the disease.

3. That it has become an instrument used in the religious worship of the Indians, and that it is not legitimate to interfere with their religious worship. If it were true that any practice employed in religious worship can never be interfered with, there would be nothing to prevent setting up in any of our cities a pagan temple with prostitutes offering themselves under the name of religion as ministers to lust.

The reports from the field of the effect of peyote on its users contain three or four accounts of the personal experience of those who have made use of it. We select one of these accounts, given by an Indian, partly because it is less technical than those given by scientific experiments, partly because its naïveté furnishes a good illustration of its so-called religious effect on members of the Indian race:

"Now, the first peyote that I took I drunk something about four cupfuls of tea. And its effects on me, that I seen, I do not want them again. I thought myself, that must be the devils. Why, their ears stuck out above their heads, and they made all kinds of faces; they made fun of me, and turn over again and sometimes and dance around me. They stuck their tongue out and made fun of me. I never paid any attention to them. I stayed right with my peyote and I prayed God. That is the first time.

"And then had effect once again. There was my girls—they was not married. I have three of them. When we was in there, the peyote meeting, why the peyote took effect on me, and I was praying myself, 'And for the homeless and for the poor,' and the fire was blazing up bright. I saw a ladder come from heaven and set right down at the end of the fireplace. Ladder was just as fine as could be made. And I seen two little fellows—about so tall—(Mr. W. indicates to Mr. L.)—come out of the fire. They wore black suits and black hats both of them little fellows; they went up to heaven on that ladder, and never came down."

We hardly need say to our readers that this is not religion, that it has no tendency to promote religion, that it has exactly an opposite tendency, since it leads the user to imagine that religion is something else than living a pure, honest, upright, kindly, and reverent life. There is a practically unanimous testimony from all missionaries, and apparently from all those interested in the moral and religious welfare of the Indian, that its intoxicating effects seriously interfere with the religion of good morals. It is equally deleterious ethically and physically. It excites the sexual passions. In the words of one of the writers, "its use among some of the Indians is more of a drunk and carousal than a religious service." Our space does not allow us to quote at length from these official reports. We must content ourselves with stating the substance of these reports in single sentences. According to the practically unanimous testimony of these witnesses, peyote has the same poisonous effect as liquor or as opium—effects so marked that it is called "dry whisky." While producing abnormal awakening of the imagination, it saps the nervous energy and will power and gradually destroys energy, clearness of thought, and persistent purpose. It does not produce violence, as does alcohol, but is followed by a greater stupor. It unfits the user for the discharge of ordinary industrial and business functions; injuriously affects the stomach, the liver, and the heart, producing dizziness and nausea, destroying the mucous coating of the stomach. It has in some instances produced blindness, led to suicide, and caused death. Probably nowhere in the country has there been a better opportunity for a study of the effects of peyote on the Indians than in Oklahoma, and as far back as 1899 Oklahoma passed a statute prohibiting its use on any Indian reservation or Indian allotment and its sale to any allotted Indian in the Territory, except as a medicine prescribed by a professional physician.

The use of peyote, promoted partly by financial interests, partly by unscrupulous Indian leaders opposed to anything which promotes Indian civilization, and partly a debasing superstition, is working a widespread evil among the Indian tribes which can be prevented only by prompt and vigorous legislative action.

Decoration Day Address by Hon. Edward C. Little, at Pittsburgh, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK N. ZIHLMAN,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Decoration Day two years ago my colleague from Kansas, Col. EDWARD C. LITTLE, who was in many battles in the Philippines as lieutenant colonel of the famous Twentieth Kansas, rode with me to the National Cemetery on the Battle Field of Antietam and delivered the annual Decoration Day address there which has been made by so many distinguished men. This year he was invited to speak on Decoration Day with Gen. John Pershing at the Arlington Military Cemetery, but had already arranged to speak elsewhere and was the orator of the day in Memorial Hall, at Pittsburgh, Pa., where he addressed some 5,000 people, almost a third of whom were the veterans of the war in Europe. The services and the long procession in this great city of a million people were this day held under the auspices of the Allied War Veterans' Memorial Day committee, participated in by all the soldiers' patriotic societies, and the oration was worthy of the occasion. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the Decoration Day address delivered on May 31, 1920, at Memorial Hall, in Pittsburgh, Pa., by my colleague, Hon. EDWARD C. LITTLE, of Kansas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COL. LITTLE'S ADDRESS.

In your capital at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania has assembled the battle flags of its regiments and thus preserved, unwritten and unspoken, perhaps the grandest record of valor and patriotism on exhibition anywhere in the world. When I visited them I looked for the flag of the Tenth Pennsylvania. My great-great-grandfather, Maj. Theophilus Little, of the New Jersey troops in the Revolutionary Army, who lies buried in the hills of Sullivan County, took part in many engagements in which it participated 140 years ago.

That regiment and the Twentieth Kansas, of which I was a member, served in the same brigade and fought together in many battles in the Philippines, beneath the Southern Cross, on the other side of the world. On Decoration Day, 1899, those regiments camped side by side on the plains of Pampanga, and for the second time I come to celebrate this day with them and honor the graves of our comrades of the Nation's wars, an illustrious line that in the Tenth Pennsylvania goes back to Valley Forge.

In spite of that brilliant and ancient record, the flag of that gallant regiment was not permitted to be unfurled in battle on the plains of Europe in the last war, but that famous regiment, like all the rest, was either renumbered or disintegrated and dissolved into other organizations by those in authority. The deeds of those brave lads on the plains of France challenge the history of the centuries in the splendor of their valor. As one obscure legislator of the Union, it is my earnest hope that before my time in Congress shall have ended we will restore and renew the laws under which those flags were collected at Harrisburg and make sure that when again Pennsylvania and Kansas march side by side into battle their flags shall return to their statehouses, covered with new laurels, to be revered and reverenced for a thousand years by generations of descendants of those you assemble to-day to pay tribute to.

Twenty-one years ago, on the 29th day of March, 1899, Pennsylvania and Kansas troops crossed the bridge over the Rio Guiguinto in the Philippines. Pennsylvania swung to the right and Kansas to the left of the high railroad bank, 3 miles from Malolos, the insurgent capital, running into a fierce ambuscade and the hottest fight that occurred in the islands. The railroad embankment was so high I could see nothing of the men on the right of the track and only knew that they were there in triumph when the short fight was over. On our side we dropped behind the best available rice dike and returned the fire of the enemy, concealed in the woods a few hundred yards away, until patience ceased to be a virtue and then I ordered a charge into the woods, and the Battle of Guiguinto closed in victory for the American soldier as the last rays of the setting sun dipped into the Pacific. Most of that Pennsylvania regiment was recruited close by this city of Pittsburgh, and I never pass through here without calling to mind our comrades of that day and that fight.

There are bonds of all sorts in this world of ours,
Fetters of friendship and ties of flowers,
  And true lovers' knots I ween.
But there's never a bond, old friend, like this,
  We drank from the same canteen.

The rich and the great sit down to dine,
And drink to each other in sparkling wine,
  From glasses of crystal and green.
But I guess in their golden potations they miss
The warmth of regard to be found in this,
  We drank from the same canteen.
From the same canteen, my soldier friend,
  We drank from the same canteen.

When the searchlight of history analyzes the tale of this great European war, the deeds of the American Army there will stagger belief. For half a century Germany, Russia, Austria, and Hungary had squandered billions and the time of millions of men preparing for conquest. With that money and that labor they could have made Europe a garden from the Mediterranean to the Arctic seas, and every man in Europe could have owned his own home. When that bogus war lord, the German Kaiser, his armies trained to the minute, was all ready, he launched his mighty thunderbolt to overrun and devastate a continent, a hemisphere, and perhaps a globe. Five million raw volunteers from Australia, Canada, South Africa, and the British Isles swarmed into France to the aid of the French Republic, and said to the rolling billows of the German hosts that had been gathering head for two generations, "Here shall thy proud waves be stayed." For four years they held the prepared soldiers at bay.

Then the tramp of 2,000,000 civilian soldiers from America shook the valley of the Rhine, and men fresh from the pursuits of civil life forever ended the Kaiser's career of crime and dream of conquest, toward which he had been shaping up his armies for 50 long years. At Cantigny, Belleau Wood, Chateau-Thierry, and the Argonne the Prussian hosts, equipped to a shoe string and trained by compulsion for decades to the arts of war, were swept from the field like bubbles before the blast of a winter's hurricane. The American boys cut the barbed wire, shattered the concrete fortifications, charged in the open the machine-gun batteries which swept the earth like hailstones, pierced the ranks of the Prussian guard, broke the impregnable Hindenburg line, and their mighty army that had challenged four continents for the empire of the world sued for peace.

Nineveh the mighty had fallen. The deeds of our soldiers whom we meet to-day to honor had become a part of the imperishable renown that has come to this Republic by the glory of its sons on a thousand battle fields before. So this day we lay our most beautiful garlands on another row of graves that stretches from the Rhine to the sea. By their sacrifices and by these tokens of ours we again dedicate this great Republic to the purpose that Mr. Lincoln gave us at Gettysburg, in Pennsylvania, that a government of the people and for the people and by the people shall not perish from the face of the earth.

We confront now the question of whether those who died for us across the sea have died in vain or whether the plans which destiny shaped shall be successfully completed. In fear and trembling, in anxiety and hysteria, in disorder and riot, but with high hopes and lofty aspirations, a redeemed world is looking into a new era. The shackles have fallen from a dozen nations, who as yet walk staggering in the dark, the blind leading the blind, watching with eager eyes for the golden rise of a sun that set in storm on the forests of the Argonne.

From the Baltic to the Caspian Europe is an armed camp. From Vladivostok to the Rhine there is no safe place in which the son of man could lay his head. What is the trouble in Europe? Our soldiers have come home and gone to work, and their presence brings us pride and pleasure, not fear and trembling. When our own Civil War closed Gen. Grant sent the Confederates home with their horses and their side arms and said, "Let us have peace." The millions of veterans who saved the Union laid down their arms and entered the walks of industry, because they were soldiers in war only and were citizens, and citizens only, in time of peace. The victors of Gettysburg and Antietam, of Shiloh and Vicksburg, of Pea Ridge and Franklin dissolved into our industrial system as quietly as a raindrop disappears on the broad bosom of the Mississippi. Why is it that a dozen little nations are at war in Europe? Why is it that every city in Germany and Russia awakens every morning to a bugle call and the tread of marching feet?

For two generations the European nations have been engaged principally in the business of making soldiers, and they must now pass a generation in unmaking them before they can have peace. You can not set nations back in the middle ages and arm them to the teeth without reaping the dragon's teeth of discord, hatred, war, and woe. This is no Christendom that devotes the best energies of its best men to such wasted and desecrated time. The armies of the Czar and the Kaiser are the darkest cloud that menaces the future happiness of the world. When this war began I ventured to say that there never could be peace in Europe till there were no longer kings in Europe. But it is now evident that the dynasty of military domination must always outlast its nominal head and will not be terminated until the tyrants' soldiers themselves have forgotten that they are soldiers and learned that they are citizens. If you turn a country into an armed camp for generations and make savages of its men, you can have no government but that of a military caste and a military despotism, which is all the people have in most European countries now.

At the close of this war the people established a republic in Germany. Every few months those trained soldiers who never disband march down the streets of Berlin, overthrow the government, precipitate a reign of terror and a riot of violence throughout all Germany, between the setting and the rising of a sun, because the Kaiser taught them to be soldiers. In Russia, Lenin holds under his standard the soldiers and the officers of the Czar, and so dominates that great country by his vicious military maladministration, which allows no man to select his own employment, permits no family to preserve its own home, and in effect makes a peon of every son and daughter of the serfs the Czar himself freed 60 years ago. Lenin has shown that liberty is safe in no country that in time of peace awakens every morning to the tread of armed men. If the European soldiers had not been professional soldiers, trained by compulsion for years to the arts of war, they would long since have gone home and gone to work as did ours, and Europe would be at rest and already see the golden rise of the sun that set in storm on the forests of the Argonne.

Nineteen hundred years ago the names of Jesus Christ and Julius Cæsar appeared at the beginning of this epoch, enunciating certain great theories which struggled for the control of mankind. One of them was right and one of them was wrong, and that question was settled, I hope and pray for all time, by the boys we sent to France. At the charge of the American soldiers, scepters broke, crowns crumbled into dust, empires vanished like breath into the frosty morning air. The other day a veteran of 98 years, from the Mexican War, joined a post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars out West, and marches at the head of the column of the great societies of peace the boys have organized.

The farmer at Concord Bridge fired the shot that was heard round the world. The Artillery at Gettysburg broke the chains from 4,000,000 slaves and established this as one mighty free Nation. The Springfields and the Mausers at San Juan and Guiguinto freed the Philippines and Cuba from Spanish tyranny. The guns that roared at Cantigny, Belleau Wood, Chateau-Thierry, and the Argonne shook the kings of Europe from their thrones and drove its emperors from their palaces. America spent 100,000 lives and $30,000,000,000 that forever hereafter forts may be dismantled, armies discharged, and peace rule the world. That is the final culmination of the great fight between Jesus Christ and Julius Cæsar that has endured for 19 centuries. Is it possible that here in this Christian Republic there is anyone who desires to reopen the case for Julius Cæsar and put Jesus Christ on trial again? What kind of an example would that be to put before the nations of Europe, distracted, divided, and devastated by the relics of Prussianism that linger?

> Oh, that some sweet bird from the south
> Might build its nest in the cannon's mouth,
> 'Till the only sound from its rusty throat
> Were the wren's or the bluebird's silver note.

But suppose we consider this from the standpoint of military prowess and achievement alone. Was this war won by those victims of compulsory military training who were sent to a march on Paris that ended in a battle in Berlin among themselves, or was this war won by the lads from free America who shouldered their rifles at the call of duty and entered the war actuated by the love of liberty and the determination that the world should live in peace and freedom from military despotisms? The Czar of all the Russias and his family sleep in unknown graves. The Kaiser, forsaken by God and man, shakes and trembles in his rat hole. Shall the men who beat his armies into the dust accept his fallacious theories, adopt his vicious policies, and shoulder upon their descendants for a thousand years the burden of such vast sums as Europe has squandered to sustain a military caste? Is that to be the conclusion of 1,900 years of contest between Julius Caesar and Jesus Christ, the answer to those who ask in the night, What is the outcome of this mighty contest? Or shall we on this day, bequeathed to us by the men who saved the Republic, reverently lay the spring blossoms upon the graves of the gallant boys who sleep in the hills of Pennsylvania or in the poppy fields of France, in the proud consciousness that their sacrifices to begin an era of perpetual peace and safety were crowned with success? To do less, my friends and comrades, would be to forget the purpose for which this holy day was established, the desire to honor the graves of the dead who died to preserve in safety governments of the people, for the people, and by the people. This war has proven that for military purposes the military traditions of a free people handed down from generation to generation of free men, exemplified by the records of such regiments as the Tenth Pennsylvania and the Twentieth Kansas, are more valuable than military castes and military despotisms established by the edicts of the war lords of military empires.

Who won this war, anyway? Soldier serfs or citizen soldiers? A few months ago, in the Liberty Hut at Washington, I heard De Valera, the magnetic Irish orator, address an immense audience, arousing much enthusiasm. After a while we all learned that somewhere in that great crowd there sat an American doughboy. Though few of us saw him, we knew just what kind of a lad he was—about 21 years old, about five feet eight inches in height, and 150 pounds in weight, with four gold bars on his sleeve, all of which we realized when he made his brief speech. De Valera, in the course of his argument, remarked that whether you concede that the Americans won the war, you will at least admit that they were the determining factor thereof. Again he presented this view to point his argument, saying that whether the Americans won the war, at least they were its determining factor. Neither of these aroused a responsive enthusiasm, and the audience was a bit restless when, for the third time, the orator repeated the statement, "The American soldiers were at least the determining factor in the European war, even if we do not say that they won the war." Then, from out somewhere in that vast audience, a brisk, definite, decided, genial, but judicial voice announced the decree that will be found on the pages of history, as that voice from the ranks of the land that fought in France answered for all of us, as he said, "I'll say we did."

As one American citizen whose ancestors first landed in this country just 300 years ago this year, I believe, after three centuries of its history, that the experiment those men projected on the Western Hemisphere has reached the highest order of success and that the system that European civilization undertook to maintain has gone down in a colossal collapse not equaled by any in the annals of mankind. If that is true, the doughboy's answer in the Liberty Hut was right, and when they ask me whether the American soldiers won this war, I am ready to say with him, "I'll say they did." Fellow citizens, what do you say?

But, fellow citizens and fellow soldiers, every victory achieved since 1865 by their sons was made possible by the sacrifices and the triumphs of the soldiers for whom this day was primarily set aside. Almost 60 years have come and gone since the advance guard of that greatest Army of Volunteers defiled past the Great White Throne, keeping time to the music of the spheres on every golden brick in the hallowed streets of the new Jerusalem. As our flags and sons come home in glorious triumph from that continent from which we spring, there lingers with us only the thin and vanishing rear of the column which saved the Union. They tell us that there is an end for all things mortal, that some day the silver stars may dim, the luster of the stripes may fade, the hallowed flag be withered in the dust, the graves of the Nation's dead go ungarlanded and forgotten. Some day the ghosts of the Grand Army of the Republic and the spirits of the men who died beyond both seas, with unseen arms reversed, and specter banners trailing in the dust, will march to the muffled music of fairy drums in the funeral procession of the last comrade of the last post of the Grand Army of the Republic. The men who went beyond the seas to make a mock of military despotisms will be able to maintain the Republic in honor and safety, and bequeath unsullied the glories of the past to the citizen soldier of the future, and them we designate and appoint to fire the last salute above the grave of the last of those venerable men whose valor shines with eternal luster on the flag of this Republic.

Now foreign wounds are stopped, peace lives again;
That she may long live here, God, say Amen!

The Right of Farmers to Organize Marketing Associations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. SUMMERS,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a great many seem to believe that the American farmers are wonderfully favored by the present prices of all commodities and that the bill which we are now considering—a bill which would authorize them to organize associations for the purpose of selling the products of their own farms—is going to give them still further favors at the expense of the consuming public.

Careful analysis of the opposition to this measure will reveal, however, that it is not the suffering consumer who is protesting, but, rather, the representatives of the big industrial centers of the East, who have not given enough time and study to the proposition and have jumped to the conclusion that the middleman's present fat profits and commissions on all of our products are hanging in the balance.

That the farmers present financial condition is not nearly as good and their future prospects are far from being as bright as some of my colleagues have asserted, also that their right to form cooperative marketing organizations will not disturb legitimate business but will rather do away with extravagant waste of time and energy, to the benefit of the producer and consumer, are points with which I will especially deal.

In the first place I desire to call your attention to a quotation from the New York Journal of Commerce, which is published essentially for the business interests. This journal's views are in refreshing contrast to the false and misleading articles that have appeared so frequently in some of the daily newspapers of the great cities of the East. The quotation follows:

> Great reduction in wheat acreage in various parts of the West is regarded by many investigators as largely due to an unusually severe winter and the movement of labor from the farm to the city. These factors undoubtedly have their important influence. According, however, to indications drawn from many sources there is an even more potent factor in the farming situation, namely, that the "stabilized" price for wheat fixed by the Government is not now on the whole profitable. If it be not productive of a net income to the farmer he can not be blamed for cutting down his acreage any more than the proprietor of an unprofitable factory can be blamed for reducing output.
> According to reports from Kansas there was an estimated loss of 43 cents an acre for the State as a whole on its last year's crop of wheat, without allowing anything for depletion of soil or depreciation of equipment. This estimate is based upon an aggregate said to amount to about 500,000 acres investigated. It does not accord with the general opinion that the farmer has been wonderfully favored, but in this connection it should be borne in mind that the farmer is often apparently prosperous in cash when, as a matter of fact, he has been coining his resources into money and really living upon his capital. Whatever may be thought of the situation in Kansas or elsewhere, the general nature of the condition to which the farmer has been exposed during the last year would naturally raise a serious doubt regarding the duration of his prosperity, even if such prosperity be regarded as real at the present time. Excessively high wages, shortage of labor, and an enormous increase in the cost of all those things which are necessary to the operation of a farm, such as wire, tools, fertilizer, and lumber, have cut away the large margin of profit which the farmer enjoyed at the opening of the war.

By the statements of representatives of various farmer organizations at the hearings in the Judiciary Committee on the Capper-Hersman bill, for which this measure is a substitute, it was brought out that the object sought to be accomplished by this bill was not the elimination of the middleman, but the object was to enable farmers to organize in order to get better prices, and in many instances this object will be attained by a more direct method of placing the products in the hands of the consumer at less cost to the latter than is now possible owing to the frequent waste of time and energy in our present system of merchandising.

As an example of one of these instances permit me to here insert the observations of a small boy in White Salmon, Wash., a town of my district.

This bright young lad, the son of a well-known lawyer of White Salmon, was on his way home from school and stopped in at his father's office.

"Say, dad," he said, "why are they bringing in White Salmon tomatoes on the Portland, Oreg., steamboat?"

"You must be mistaken," said the father.

"No, I am not," replied the youth. "I came round by way of the dock and the steamer had just arrived from Portland and they were unloading a lot of tomatoes that were grown down there on Mr. ———'s place. I know, 'cause I saw his label on the boxes and was out in his garden one day and saw those same boxes."

"Well, well," said the lawyer, proud of his son's perspicuity, "that is peculiar. Let us go down and see about it," and off they went to investigate.

At the dinner table that night the result of their investigation was reported to the family, and here is the story in brief:

Fine, big, half-ripe tomatoes, grown within a quarter of a mile of White Salmon, had been picked and packed in crates, sold to a commission agent in White Salmon, hauled down to the commission warehouse, resold to a commission house in Portland, 100 miles down the Columbia River. They were then hauled down to the dock, loaded onto the boat, and shipped to Portland, where they were unloaded, hauled to a warehouse, resold to a merchant in White Salmon, hauled from the warehouse back to the boat, loaded thereon, shipped to White Salmon, unloaded, hauled to the merchant's store, and from there delivered to White Salmon homes at fancy prices. The family had some of the very same tomatoes on the table that evening, but the good housewife, when she heard their history, said: "Never again; I'll send down to the gardens next time."

The same facts are true in regard to Kennewick cherries, which were handled by express on the railroad to Spokane, 140 miles away, and returned to Pasco, which is 1 mile from Kennewick. The cherries reached the consumer after having traveled 280 miles and having been handled no less than 10 times.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to legitimate business profits and am not blaming the White Salmon tomato grower or the Portland commission merchant. They were simply the victims of circumstances. But why could not the tomato or rather the vegetable growers of White Salmon organize and sell their tomatoes and vegetables themselves to the merchants of White Salmon or to anyone else who wanted them? Business would not thus be curtailed or restricted. It would simply be an elimination of wasteful energy, all of which costs money that is added to the consumer's bill and is an important factor in the present high prices.

Whenever the farmer purchases an article from any merchant he has always been obliged to ask, "How much?" And he has paid the price. When he has had anything to sell he has been obliged to ask, "How much will you pay to-day?" And he has been required to accept it or let his produce rot. The law of supply and demand will always prevail and will always act as a protective influence, so that a farmers' cooperative marketing association, authorized in this bill, will always be limited thereby in its efforts to secure fair prices. There may also be more than one such organization in a community, so that competitive influences will also prevail.

The farmer does not expect to unduly profit by the enactment of this law, nor does he expect the cost to the consumer to be enhanced. But he does believe that this bill, if made law, will eliminate two or three fellows who stand guard in their own interest—interlopers, if you please—along the pathway from the farmer to the ultimate consumer and appropriate a good share of the profits that rightfully belong to the farmer.

Restore to the farmer some of these profits, and the great dangers of our increasing urban population will be lessened, and conditions such as now prevail in the State of Michigan, where there are 18,000 idle farms, will not continue to spread further over our farming districts. Production would be speeded up and more land cultivated, because fewer of our farm boys would be headed for the cities to obtain higher wages and participate in the pleasures there afforded.

Farming is the most important business in the world, and we are the greatest agricultural nation in the world, but our lands are capable of producing more than they now produce, and if we are to further encourage the back-to-the-farm movement we must make farm life more attractive by allowing the farmer to receive prices sufficient to enable him to purchase modern conveniences and thrive with his city cousin.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I have always conscientiously stood for measures which benefit the great farming and fruit-growing section of our population, and I expect to vote for this bill. It is a step in the right direction; a step that will have a much greater influence than most of us realize; a step that will assist the farmer in obtaining a fair price for honest labor, that will not increase costs to the consumer, that will further encourage the greater and more intensive cultivation of our lands, and will not unduly disturb legitimate business enterprise.

I desire to append hereto for insertion in the RECORD a copy of this bill, which follows:

An act (H. R. 13931) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products.

Be it enacted, etc., That persons engaged in the production of agricultural products as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, or fruit growers may act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce such products of their members; and such producers may organize and operate such associations and make the necessary contracts and agreements to effect that purpose, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, That such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof, as such producers, and conform to one or both of the following requirements:

First. That no member of the association is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein, or,

Second. That the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent per annum.

SEC. 2. That if the Secretary of Agriculture shall have reason to believe that any such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced by reason thereof, he shall serve upon such association a complaint stating his charge in that respect, to which complaint shall be attached, or contained therein, a notice of hearing, specifying a day and place not less than thirty days after the service thereof, requiring the association to show cause why an order should not be made directing it to cease and desist from so restraining trade or lessening competition in such article. An association so complained of may at the time and place so fixed show cause why such order should not be entered. The evidence given on such a hearing shall be reduced to writing and made a part of the record therein. If upon such hearing the Secretary of Agriculture shall be of the opinion that such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is, or is about to become, unduly enhanced thereby, he shall issue and cause to be served upon the association an order reciting the facts found by him, directing such association to cease and desist therefrom. If such association fails or neglects for thirty days to obey such order, the Secretary of Agriculture shall file in the district court in which such association has its principal place of business a certified copy of the order and of all the records in the proceeding, together with a petition asking that the order be enforced, and shall give notice to the Attorney General and to said association of such filing. Such district court shall thereupon have jurisdiction to affirm, set aside, or modify said order, and may make rules as to pleadings and proceedings to be had in considering such order.

The facts found by the Secretary of Agriculture and recited as set forth in said order shall be prima facie evidence of such facts, but either party may adduce additional evidence. The Department of Justice shall have charge of the enforcement of such order. After the order is so filed in such district court and while pending for review the district court may issue a temporary writ of injunction forbidding such association from violating such order or any part thereof. The court may, upon conclusion of its hearing, enforce such order by a permanent injunction or other appropriate remedy. Service of such complaint and of all notices may be made upon such association by service upon any officer or agent thereof engaged in carrying on its business, and such service shall be binding upon such association, the officers, and members thereof: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to the organizations, or individual members thereof, described in section 6 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, known as the Clayton Act.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER.

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

On the bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize the association of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration (H. R. 13931) accomplishes what was aimed at in the Capper-Hersman bill. The objectionable features of the Capper-Hersman bill have been eliminated, while the present bill gives to the farmer all the benefits intended by the proponents of the Capper-Hersman bill. This fact is best evidenced by the fact that Senator CAPPER has introduced into the Senate this bill as a substitute for his original bill, while Congressman HERSMAN is advocating the present bill. Personally I am fully convinced that the change of the form of the legislation is not only advisable but necessary. Class legislation should not be tolerated, and in the end always proves injurious to the very class intended to be the beneficiary. If I was convinced that this was class legislation, no man on the floor of the House would be more outspoken against its enactment. The truth is that by this law the farmer is simply assured that he can do the things now permitted to be done by other corporations. The farmer already has the right under the law to form cooperative associations for the purpose of producing and marketing his products. However, these association are not permitted to have capital stock. Experience has shown that these associations, in many instances, can not be successfully operated without capital stock. It is not the purpose of this law to permit the forming of these associations with a view to earning large dividends for the stockholders. The bill provides that 8 per cent on the amount invested shall be the maximum. So far as the State of Michigan is concerned, I am confident that a 6 per cent return on the amount invested would have been sufficient; however, this is not a local bill; and in many States in the Union the interest rate is much higher, and the farmer should not be asked to receive a less return on the money actually invested than the current rate for like investment in the community where the investment is made.

The intent is that the principal profit made by the association shall inure to the benefit of the members and not to the benefit of the association. Regardless of the amount of stock owned in the association, all members have equal votes. In other words, the farmer who is able to loan $100 to the association in the form of capital stock, and whose purpose it is to secure an equitable market for his products, will have as much to say about the operation of the association as the farmer whose finances are such that he can loan $5,000 for the same purpose. The members of these associations must be genuine farmers, and not investors. Stock will not, and can not, be sold to the investing public. As a general proposition all corporations engaged in commerce have but one object—to pay dividends on the investment. Under the terms of this bill capital stock is a mere incident, necessary in order that the purposes for which the association is formed may be realized. There will be no watered stock. On the other hand, every dollar represented by stock will be actually used in carrying on the business of the association.

The enactment of this law will in no way affect existing or future legislation by the several States. This legislation only limits the right to operate in interstate and foreign commerce. That is the only power that Congress can confer upon such associations.

It has been urged in this debate by the opponents of this measure that the object sought to be accomplished by this bill was not the reduction of the cost of distributing the products of the farm. I deny this. And it is insisted that the object of the law is to enable the farmer to organize to get better prices. We could admit both of these propositions and still find abundant justification and actual necessity for the enactment of the law. That the farmer is at a disadvantage in dealing with the men who buy his products, and especially the large corporations dealing in food products, can not be denied, and it is imperative that the only practical method is through associations and common selling agencies.

Under present conditions the farmer has practically nothing to say about what he is to receive for his products. On the other hand, the manufacturer has all to say. Months in advance of placing the article on the market the manufacturer determines, to the penny, just what it will cost him to produce the article. All overhead is included. In the well-managed business concern the overhead even includes taxes, and to this amount the manufacturer adds his profit. As has been said, he does business on a "cost-plus" basis. If labor demands a high reward, that amount is added to the article sold. The manufacturer is not the loser. The consumer pays the price. In this way the manufacturer is able to operate at a profit. If he demands an unreasonable profit, then he is a profiteer. If he combines for the purpose of controlling the market and thereby unreasonably enhances his profit or prevents competition, he violates the law and should be prosecuted. On the other hand, the farmer's occupation is such that he has in the past had but little to say about the price he is to receive for what he sells. His market is necessarily limited. Individually his production is so small that he can not choose his market; he must take what is offered. His only hope is in collective bargaining.

Under the present system, and without the benefits of this law, he can not successfully bid against industry for labor needed to carry on his farm. One of two things must happen—the farmer must be assured of a fair return upon his investment and for his labor, or the farmer will not produce.

As a public benefactor he has ever been in the forefront. The parting of the ways has come. In popular vernacular, he only demands a "living wage," and it is the duty of this Congress to see to it that means are provided whereby this can be secured to him. His day is not an eight-hour day. His pay check does not come rain or shine. Wind and weather may ruin the season's crop. Yet, by reason of his method of doing business, he does not ask to be made good for these losses. The books are closed each season. All he asks is the right to live and to let live. I have no fear of actual farmers conspiring to unreasonably control the market. If he can show the actual cost of production, then the price of that product should be that cost plus a reasonable profit. The people in the city are wont to criticize the price paid for foodstuffs without considering the cost of production. Recently the Federal fair-price committee, composed of retail grocers and retail meat dealers in the city of Detroit, determined that the milk producers of the Detroit area must sell milk for $2.75 per hundred pounds, f. o. b. Detroit. This was an arbitrary price arbitrarily arrived at. The producers were able to show that it was costing $4.26 per hundred to produce this milk, and it was necessary for the producers to invoke the injunction to prevent extermination. It is interesting to note that while this committee was asking the farmers to sell their milk for one-third less than the cost of production, the retailers in the city of Detroit were selling potatoes for $7.50 per bushel, and these same potatoes were sold by the farmers of Michigan last fall at from 90 cents to $1.25 a bushel. Round steak was retailing in the city of Detroit at 60 cents a pound, while the farmer was selling this same beef on hoof at from 9 to 12 cents a pound. This is a concrete illustration of why the present law is demanded. The farmer is not getting his share of the money paid by the consumer. Legitimate middlemen are necessary, but gambling brokers and speculators in foodstuffs are parasites, and the sooner they are eliminated the sooner the producer and the consumer will come into their own.

It has been urged in debate that "this bill bears all the earmarks of the dangerous propaganda that is being put forth by the Nonpartisan League, which is fostering principles and ideas that are inimical to our Government, and which is seeking to put into practice things which will tear down the institutions of this Government." I am unalterably opposed to this organization and its socialistic tendencies and deny that this law in any way relates to this organization. The action of such organizations can only be forestalled by sane, progressive, and reasonable measures like the one now under consideration.

We can talk about keeping the boys on the farm; we may talk about the beauties of farm life, the healthy climate, the independence of the farmer; but the modern American boy will not remain on the farm and work from 12 to 15 hours a day for less than one-half the wage he can receive in the city for eight hours' work. Sentiment means nothing to him.

A recent survey made in the State which I have the honor in part to represent shows that 8.74 per cent of the farms of the State are wholly idle this year—approximately 1,668,000 acres. The total male population over 15 years of age on the farms in the State is 230,000, or 82.5 acres to be worked by each man or boy; 18,232 acres are idle this year as compared with 11,831 last year. This condition is due to lack of farm help. The trend is toward the city—less work and higher wages. I might say, however, that in the district which I represent only about 3 per cent of the farms are idle. These are real farms, splendid, fertile land, highly productive, and fully equipped. A large percentage of the men on farms are past 50 years of age. There are 30,300 vacant houses on farms; 10,000 of these have been vacated within the last year. Of the 276,000 men on farms three years ago, 46,000 have since left, 20,000 of them during the last year. As a result there will be a decrease of 15.8 per cent in the average of cultivated crops this year. The number of dairy cattle has decreased 11.3 per cent during the last year—and this is one of the great dairy States. The conditions in Michigan are typical of the conditions throughout the Union. Something must be done, and must be done soon, if we are to retain enough men on the farms to produce food and clothing for our great city population.

Demagogues may talk; idealists may theorize; political parties may resolve; and Congress may legislate—but none of this will perceptibly reduce the high cost of living. The war has made many changes, but the economic law of supply and demand still stands, and our only salvation is in economy and production. While it is essential to our national well-being that our industries prosper and that our factories flourish, it is essential to our very existence that our farms operate. It is necessary that we produce meat, potatoes, and bread in order that we may manufacture automobiles, sofa pillows, and furniture. This can only be brought about by making it possible for the tiller of the soil to compete in a commercial way with these other dependent industries, and collective bargaining on his part, without fear of unwarranted interference, will do much to bring this about.

It is the organized middlemen who oppose this law. They well know that farmers, by cooperation, can reduce the cost of food distribution. The cause of the farmer in this case is the cause of the consumer. Even if the farmer does receive a little more for his product, the consumer will buy that same product much cheaper. Therefore the benefit is mutual. The bill now before Congress absolutely protects against profiteering and extortion on the part of the agriculturist.

The gentleman from West Virginia vehemently urges that "the country would see organized under the terms of this act gigantic food and clothing trusts, vested with power to charge whatever their sweet will dictated, and to grind under their iron heel every family in the land." The same gentleman, who represents a large coal-mining district, insists that no farmer or farmer organization has asked him to support this bill. His erroneous conception of the purposes and possibilities of the bill is only exceeded by his lack of familiarity with the desires, wants, and necessities of the real farmer. If he had taken the trouble to make any investigation he would find that every great agricultural organization in the country had been represented at the hearings before the Judiciary Committee. The National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Dairymen's League, the National Board of Farm Organizations, all are urging this measure.

Section 2 does not limit the protection afforded by any existing law. In fact, it gives an additional protection. At any time the Secretary of Agriculture shall have reason to believe that any of these associations restrain trade or lessen competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced by reason thereof, he is empowered to act—to investigate and to enforce his orders. The courts of the United States are open to him. The public is fully safeguarded. It is true that the producer can not be harassed, threatened, and prosecuted without an investigation, at which the producer will have an opportunity to be heard without being dragged into the courts solely for the purpose of annoyance and intimidation. The farmers of my district will welcome this provision; the farmers of the Nation will welcome it. They do not claim immunity from the law, but they do insist on, and are entitled to, the protection of the law.

The Farm Loan Act.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPHUS P. NELSON,

OF WISCONSIN.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the present condition of the food supply of this Nation, and the status of food production in this country, taken together with the fact that Europe is largely dependent upon the United States for food, is such that Congress—this Congress—is charged with a tremendous responsibility.

Legislation is demanded to relieve the strain now placed upon agriculture as an industry. I fear that the situation is much more serious than we here in Washington are able to appreciate.

For several months past agricultural colleges of the various States, together with the county agents, working in close touch with the farmers in practically every county of the principal agricultural States of this country, have been gathering information as to the condition of agriculture as an industry, as to the status of food production, and as to the ability of the farmer under present restraints and limitations to meet the demands which the Nation and the world are making upon him for food. The mass of information which these agencies have gathered and compiled is so great and is of such a serious nature, and the conditions disclosed are so widespread and general, as to cause genuine alarm. I will not take the time of the House nor space in the RECORD to submit a complete analysis of such information as has been compiled. That work has been done by others. I will cite merely a few instances to indicate the trend of events as shown by these reports.

Within a radius of 10 miles of a county seat in the best agricultural region of Kentucky there are 27 vacant farmhouses standing idle, with no one living in them.

In a certain Iowa county, within a radius of 10 miles of the county seat there are 2 dozen vacant farms. It is estimated that there are 50,000 fewer men on the farms of Iowa to-day than before the war.

One locality in Indiana reports that within a mile and a half there are 5 vacant houses.

In New York, the agricultural department of Cornell University reports 24,000 vacant farmhouses in that State.

The December estimates of the United States Department of Agriculture show that there were 11,719,000 acres less of winter wheat planted in the fall of 1919 than the year before.

A January report of the Department of Agriculture shows that the number of hogs in the United States had fallen off 1,675,000 head, about 8.7 per cent.

February figures from Iowa show that State had suffered a loss of 433,000 hogs, 28,000 milk cows, and 86,000 beef cattle.

The same report shows that Illinois had 50,000 less beef cattle and 401,000 less hogs.

Kansas reports 30 per cent less hogs.

Missouri also shows decreases.

There must be some very vital and powerful factors at work to produce such tremendous changes.

I take it that one of the causes for this condition is the scarcity of farm help. Harry O'Brien, a well-known investigator and writer upon agricultural subjects, discusses this phase of the situation in a recent issue of the Saturday Evening Post. He says:

> An Iowa farmer of whom I know paid a farm hand $65 a month all last winter, when he had no work to be done, just to keep that farm hand for the day when there would be work. In addition to wages, he gave him his milk, his firewood, a garden, use of an automobile, and his house rent free.

Mr. O'Brien cites another instance:

> When an Ohio farmer who had 13 dairy cows from which he sold milk for Cincinnati consumption saw his boys go off to town to work for $45 and $60 a week, he sold off 5 cows and kept just what he could milk himself and do his other work.

There is no use for me to multiply instances or incidents. The evidence is compelling that farming, with its long hours of drudgery and low wages, is not attractive to labor. The evidence is also compelling that if the farmer is to secure sufficient help to till the land and thus produce the food required by those who live and work in our cities he must compete in the amount of wages paid with the industries of the cities.

Clearly the farmer must have access to money at low rates and on convenient terms if he is to meet this situation.

And yet, with this awful condition confronting agriculture, and through it confronting the Nation, threatening the welfare of all our people, Congress has been unable to grasp the situation in a statesmanlike way and to agree upon remedial legislation.

The farmer needs credit. This condition of agriculture calls for a complete and adequate system of finance adaptable and suitable to the needs of the farmer, which needs are far different from those of the business man in the city. While there is great need for short-time credit, I shall not now discuss that phase of the problem, but will confine myself at this time to a discussion of long-time credit. In 1916 we passed the farm-loan act to give the farmer long-time loans upon his land—loans for 33 years at low rates of interest, the principal to be repaid in very small or semiannual payments. This is known as the amortization plan. It was a wonderful piece of legislation. Under this law loans aggregating $387,000,000 have been made to farmers of the United States at low rates of interest, 5½ and 6 per cent net to the farmer, no commissions being charged and no commissions being permitted.

I think the record of the Federal and the joint-stock land banks in the short time they have been in operation shows that these institutions are rendering a great service to agriculture and to the Nation as a whole.

These banks, according to the title of the act creating them, were expected "to equalize rates of interest on farm loans." And there is abundant evidence that interest rates have been reduced in every high-interest section of the United States. That is a very important service for these banks to have performed. They have done more than merely to save a handsome sum in interest for all who borrowed of these banks. Their mere presence in the farm-loan field supplied the competition necessary to reduce the rates of interest for all farmers who borrow, no matter of whom they borrow. It has been estimated that the farmers of America already have been saved a total of not less than $30,000,000 in interest and $20,000,000 in commissions by the operations and as a result of the competition of the banks created by the farm-loan act.

And that fact has aroused the bitter opposition of the old-style, commission-charging farm-mortgage broker. When any campaign becomes bitter, the bars are let down for all manner of misrepresentation and false statement. Often, under these conditions, false issues are raised which prejudice a case before it is fairly opened for discussion.

Congress can not act intelligently on the various bills, a dozen in all, which have been introduced as amendments to the farm-loan act, unless Congress is correctly informed as to the operations of the various agencies which have been created by this act to aid and encourage agricultural development. So many false issues have been raised, so much effort has been expended by the enemies of the farm-loan act for the purpose of throwing dust into the eyes of Congress and for the further purpose of arousing dissensions among the friends of the farm-loan act that it is important that we should be on guard against these insidious attacks.

Before we can properly appreciate the service which the banks of the farm-loan system are rendering, we must consider the condition in which the farm-loan business of this country had been up to the time of the passage of the farm-loan act. It is quite natural for the inquiring mind to ask, "Where did the farmer get his money before the farm-loan act was passed?" I take it that most Members of this body are familiar with the fact that the money loaned to farmers on farm mortgages throughout the United States aggregates about $4,000,000,000, according to the best authorities. Of the $4,000,000,000 of farm mortgages, the life insurance companies held $1,100,000,000; the savings banks, State banks, trust companies, and commercial banks $1,000,000,000; eleemosynary institutions $400,000,000; local loans of farmer to farmer, or brother to brother, or father to son, $1,250,000,000; all other farm-mortgage loans $250,000,000.

Thus we see that the farm-loan business is a considerable business.

It is important for us to inquire how the farmer secured his mortgage loan from these various sources. As all know, the farmer did not deal direct with the insurance companies, neither did he deal direct with the eleemosynary institutions, and seldom did he deal direct with the savings banks, the State banks, the trust companies, and the commercial banks.

Almost without exception, in securing money from any of these institutions the farmer was compelled to deal through a broker. True, the broker styled himself a "farm-mortgage banker," but just as a rose by any other name would smell as sweet, so the man who lives by charging a commission on mortgage loans is a broker, no matter what fanciful name he creates and adopts for his business. It has been the practice of the farm-mortgage brokers to charge a commission on the loans they have made to farmers ranging from 1 per cent to 4 and 5 per cent.

The practice was something like this: The life insurance companies and other institutions having funds to invest in farm mortgage securities selected the best agricultural sections of the United States as the territory in which they could safely lend their funds.

Next, these institutions proceeded to organize that territory. Generally one agent or banker was given the exclusive right to make loans for a particular life insurance company in a particular State or in territory contiguous to a particular city or commercial center. This man usually considered himself a "farm-mortgage banker."

He in turn proceeded to organize his territory by appointing agents in various county seats and other trading centers throughout the territory assigned to him. This agent or subagent might be a justice of the peace, or a fire insurance agent, or a small-town lawyer, or, as frequently was the case, a country banker. Then the life insurance company would supply money for prime first-mortgage loans at 5, 5½, or 6 per cent net to the life insurance company. But the poor "mortgage banker" had to live. So he charged a commission.

But this was not all. The poor justice of the peace, fire insurance agent, country lawyer, or country banker, as the case happened to be, also had to live. And he also charged the poor farmer an additional commission. Of course it all may have been named in the contract as a single commission, amounting to a certain per cent of the loan, but in practice the commission was divided so that all the little parasites along the line might live by taking a toll out of the poor farmer.

The result of all this was that, while the life insurance companies were getting 5, 5½, or 6 per cent net for their loans, excepting in the far West and far Southwest, where the rates were somewhat higher, the poor farmer was paying 6, 6½, 7, and 8 per cent, excepting in the far West and Southwest, where the net rate to farmers went as high as 10 per cent.

But this was not all. The farmer might have struggled through all this if it had occurred to him only once or twice in a lifetime. However, under the old system, loans on farm mortgages were made for short periods, many of them for only three years and none of them for more than five years. The average was about four years. Thus we see that the farmer had to go through this matter of commissions every four or five years if he was unable to pay off his mortgage at its maturity. He not only had to pay these recurring commissions, but every time he renewed his mortgage he had to pay new abstract, new appraisal and inspection, and new registration fees. All this operated to increase the cost to the farmer.

Into this system, which was cumbersome and very unsatisfactory, there crept all manner of abuses until a vicious circle enveloped the farmer and placed a burden on agriculture which it could not carry.

Then we had a long period of agitation, with various proposals made to relieve this situation and correct the abuses. Two investigating committees went to Europe to study rural-credits systems in the older countries for the purpose of adapting such principles and practices in the making of long-time loans to farmers as might be suitable to the conditions in this newer country.

The farm-loan act is the result of this long and careful study of the entire subject of farm loans.

Briefly, the great benefits of this system are to be found in these facts:

(1) The farmer may now borrow money at a reasonable rate without paying commissions to anyone. The law forbids any of the banks created by or authorized by the farm-loan act to charge the farmer a commission.

(2) That the farmer may now borrow his money for a long period of years—20 to 35 years—and repay the principal in small annual or semiannual installments, thus escaping all renewal charges, appraisal and inspection fees after the first year.

It is proper for an inquiring mind to ask just how this is done. Under the farm-loan act a Federal land bank or a joint-stock land bank is permitted to invest its capital in farm mortgages. Then the bank is permitted to deposit the mortgages it has purchased with a registrar of the United States Government, who inspects the mortgages and appraises the land.

If the mortgages are properly executed and the value of the land is as represented, the bank is then permitted to issue bonds running 20 or 30 years against these mortgages to the amount of their face value. The bank then is permitted to sell these bonds in the market to investors. The bank then lends this money secured by sale of bonds on still other farm mortgages. The new mortgages are deposited with the appraiser and news bonds are issued. This operation may be repeated twenty times by the Federal land banks and fifteen times by the joint-stock land banks. This is the way the money is raised under the farm loan act.

Mr. Speaker, this law is based upon the experience of hundreds of years of operation in this and older countries. It is a good law. It emancipates the American farmer and releases him from the clutches of the loan shark.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you that it is the purpose of the enemies of the farm loan act to so cripple it by indirect attacks that it will cease to function. The men who profited for years by lending money to farmers at high rates of interest, plus exorbitant commissions, are conducting an organized campaign to put the Federal farm loan system out of business, so that they once more may control the field of farm loans and again may fatten themselves at the expense of the American farmer. These selfish interests have brought a suit, which is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, contesting the constitutionality of the farm loan act. Furthermore, these same selfish interests have circularized Congressmen, as well as bankers and farm papers, with their propaganda, seeking to befog the issue. And these same selfish interests have insidiously attacked first one division of the farm loan system and then another division.

Congressmen, of course, are aware that the farm loan act provides for a dual system of banks.

One branch of the system is operated upon a mutual or semi-cooperative basis. These banks are known as the Federal land banks. They are 12 in number and now have a total capital stock of $24,000,000. Quite contrary to the popular conception among Congressmen, the major portion of this $24,000,000 of capital stock was subscribed by the farmers themselves. It is true that in the beginning, as has been stated, the Government subscribed approximately $9,000,000 to the capital stock of these banks. However, since that time $1,200,000 of the Government's subscription, I am told, has been refunded to the Government, so that to-day, of the $24,000,000 of outstanding capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks, the farmers themselves have subscribed $16,760,000, or almost $17,000,000. At this point it may not be out of place to say that within a few years the entire amount of the Government's subscription to the capital of these banks will be retired. Then the stock of these banks will be owned entirely by borrowing farmers. I offer this statement of facts at this time and in this connection in order to disabuse the mind of any uninformed Member of an impression somewhat prevalent that these banks are Government institutions, with their entire capital furnished by the Government, which report has served to arouse a great deal of prejudice in certain quarters against these institutions.

The other branch of the dual system of banks, created and authorized by the farm loan act, received no Government aid. The banks of this branch of the system are known as joint-stock land banks. Their capital is subscribed by private individuals. However, these joint-stock land banks are subject to the same rigid supervision by the Government as the Federal land banks. It has been said by the enemies of the farm loan act that the joint-stock land banks are operated for profit. This is true. But no enemy of the farm-loan system has been fair enough to tell you and to tell the people that the profits of the joint-stock land banks are limited by law. No critic of the farm-loan system has been fair enough to tell you that the rate of interest which a joint-stock land bank may charge is fixed by law, in the same manner, and under the same regulation, as the rate to be charged by the Federal land banks.

Of all the men who have attacked the joint-stock land banks, not one has been fair. They have said that under the law a joint-stock land bank might lend money for any purpose. They have assumed that this statement would be accepted as truth because the law does not specifically prohibit joint-stock land banks from lending money for other than agricultural purposes. However, I am convinced that all these men knew that the title of the farm loan act declares that it is the purpose of this law to provide money "for agricultural purposes." I am also convinced that the men who attack the joint-stock land banks know that these banks could not lend money for any other than agricultural purposes unless the law gave them specific permission to do so.

And I am sure that every man who has made this statement to Members of Congress and in the public press has been fully aware that the Farm Loan Board has made a ruling to remove all doubt as to the meaning of the law on this point, and that in this ruling the Farm Loan Board has refused to approve any loans of joint-stock land banks not made for purely agricultural purposes.

Furthermore, the enemies of the Farm Loan System have sought to break down public confidence in the act itself by conveying the impression that the joint-stock land banks were making "enormous" and "outrageous" profits and that, as a result, these institutions were springing up in great number, like mushrooms, all over the country. One statement made and widely circulated was to the effect that one of the joint-stock land banks had made a profit of 30½ per cent. If that were true, or anything like it had been true, it would have been sufficient cause for alarm. But what was the fact? The statement was so "outrageously" untrue that the Farm Loan Board issued a statement setting forth the fact that the profit that had been made by the particular joint-stock land bank in question was not 30½ per cent, nor anything like 30½ per cent, but a quite modest earning of only 9½ per cent.

Now, what is the fact as to the number of these joint-stock land banks that were springing up over the country? Mr. Speaker, only 31 joint-stock land banks have been chartered in the entire United States. And three of these have since surrendered their charters.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it is a notorious fact that there are in this country 6,000 mortgage bankers, many of whom are merely brokers for the great life insurance companies, but all of whom are lending money to the farmer without any restrictions placed upon the interest rates they may charge or the commissions they may charge. Mr. Speaker, these are the enemies of the farm loan system. They have been crafty. They have been unfair. They have resorted to insidious methods. And above all they have been extremely industrious. There is a reason. These selfish interests make their attacks bitterly as they do because they have felt the keen competition of the banks of the farm loan system, and because these selfish interests have been forced by this competition to reduce their rates of interest and to reduce or eliminate their commission charges.

Mr. Speaker, some years ago Gen. Edward S. Bragg, of my State, served as a delegate from Wisconsin to the Democratic national convention which gave Grover Cleveland the nomination for his second term as President of the United States. As some of you may recall, Mr. Cleveland was bitterly assailed by his enemies in that convention. Gen. Bragg, in seconding the nomination, said of Grover Cleveland, "We love him for the enemies he has made."

Mr. Speaker, one of the most direct and convincing proofs we have had as to the efficacy of the farm loan system is found in the character of the opposition to it. I frankly admit that if I did not understand anything else about the farm loan act, I still should hold it in very high regard because of the enemies it has made.

The enemies of the farm loan system are attacking the system as a whole. Do not forget that their object is to get rid of the entire system. Their attack at this session has been centered on the joint-stock land banks. But do any of you suppose that when they have killed the joint-stock land banks they will be satisfied? Indeed they will not. They will begin their attack anew on the system as a whole, centering at the next session upon the Federal land banks. The point I would have Congress understand is that the attack now made with such vigor upon the joint-stock land banks is only a part of a great general fight to break down the farm loan system as a whole, and that if the enemies succeed in crippling the joint-stock land banks they then will attack with renewed vigor the Federal land banks.

For that reason I want to return for a moment to the consideration of one or two specific instances of misrepresentation by the enemies of the farm loan system.

I desire to submit a letter from the Farm Loan Board correcting a statement that has become current about the earnings of these banks. This letter was addressed to Guy Huston, of Chicago, president of the American Association of Joint-Stock Land Banks, and in effect says that the statement that any joint-stock land bank has made 30½ per cent is false, and that a correct statement of earnings of the particular bank referred to would have been but 9½ per cent per annum, a great difference. I submit this letter from the Farm Loan Board because this seems to be the only effectual way of dissipating the prejudice created by the first and erroneous statement.

I read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FARM LOAN BUREAU,
February 28, 1920.

Mr. GUY HUSTON,
President American Association of Joint-Stock Land Banks,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: The secretary of your association has to-day stated to the Farm Loan Board that an incorrect statement as to the earnings of your institution, in which it was quoted as earning 30½ per cent per annum, is being widely circulated in a campaign against joint-stock land banks, and he stated further that the fact that the Federal farm-loan act imposes no limitation upon joint-stock land banks, as to the amount and purposes of loans, or the vocation of the borrower, is being widely circulated in the same campaign. He has asked us to give you a statement on these points, with leave to give publicity to such statement. We willingly comply.

It is probable that the statement as to your earnings grew out of the misinterpretation of a memorandum issued from this office in which that figure was given as covering your earnings for a period of 22 months. Subsequently, this statement was supplemented by the following memorandum, dated January 8, 1920:

"With reference to memorandum, dated June 18, 1919, showing earnings of the First Joint-Stock Land Bank of Chicago as at the close of business May 31, 1919, the following information is respectfully submitted:

"On page 1 of the above-mentioned memorandum the average amount of capital stock invested in this bank for the period from organization to May 31, 1919, was shown to be $299,148.15. This amount is correct, as shown by the records of this bureau, such records being compiled from certificates of the First Joint-Stock Land Bank of Chicago. Since preparing the above-mentioned memorandum, however, it has been called to my attention that these certificates were not made at the time the funds were actually collected on account of this stock subscription, but at some subsequent date prior to the issuance of bonds against such stock, and that the average capital investment on May 31, 1919, was actually $354,340.

"Earnings of this institution at that time were shown to be $61,208.60, which would represent 17.3 per cent on the average investment for the period from organization to May 31, 1919, or about 9½ per cent per annum on average capital invested.

"Respectfully submitted.

"H. HISE,
"Chief Land Bank Examiner."

The above memorandum correctly states your earning as reported to this office and verified by examination of your institution.

In reference to the amount of loan, the board has made a specific ruling as follows:

"Maximum loan to one borrower: No loan to a single borrower made by any joint-stock land bank in excess of 15 per cent of its capital and surplus will be approved as security for a bond issue, and in no case will such approval be given of any loan in excess of $50,000."

As to the purpose of loan, the board's position was defined in a circular, from which the following is a quotation:

"PURPOSE OF THE LOAN.

"The general purposes of the act, however, are so clearly defined in the title, 'To provide capital for agricultural development,' and this purpose is so generally understood and accepted that the board feels it is inconsistent with the purposes of the act and sound public policy that loans should be made by joint-stock land banks except for the purposes enumerated in the act or other purposes related to agricultural development.

"You are, therefore, requested to confine your loans to such purposes and advised that the board can not approve loans which are made for the purpose of speculation or other purposes entirely foreign to agricultural production."

In justice to the joint-stock land banks it should be further stated that these suggestions of the board have been cheerfully accepted, and we think very nearly universally complied with; and the legislative committee of your association recently went on record before the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate as approving these limitations and favoring their incorporation in the farm-loan act.

You are at liberty to give such publicity as you may desire to this statement.

Respectfully, yours,
W. W. FLANNAGAN,
Secretary Farm Loan Board.

I am disappointed to find that some Members of Congress view the farm-loan act as a sort of glorified "poor law" for the relief of paupers, and to view the duties of the Farm Loan Board as being for the most part those of dispensing small charity to small farmers. On this point let me read an utterance made some time ago by a former Secretary of the United States Treasury. He said:

The American farmer is not a pauper seeking alms. Neither is he a ward of the Government to be treated as an irresponsible child.

Up to the time of the passage of the farm loan act the system of farm credits in operation in this country was exceedingly cumbersome. It was so cumbersome that it could not furnish the kind of service the farmer required at any price. That is, it could not furnish loans on the long-term amortization plan. Also the entire field of farm credits was without anything more than the most primitive—and therefore futile—regulation as to rates of interest and commission charges.

After an exhaustive study of the needs of this country and after another exhaustive study of the credit systems of European countries, Congress decided to adequately finance agriculture as a great underlying industry essential to the life of the Nation.

Congress did not contemplate any petty remedies. It did not contemplate charity for the small farmers. It did not contemplate a special privilege for the big farmers.

But Congress did contemplate establishing a practical system of rural credits by which the farmer would be enabled to secure as a right—not as a favor—adequate funds at reasonable rates.

Some of those who now are fighting the Federal and joint-stock land banks forget what were the conditions which prevailed before the passage of the farm-loan act. To get this matter before us in brief form I shall read from a widely known farm paper published by the present Secretary of Agriculture, E. T. Meredith. The paper I read from is Successful Farming, and the article I read was written by W. G. McAdoo, former Secretary of the Treasury. It is as follows:

THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT—ARE THE PROPOSED CHANGES CONTRARY TO THE FARMERS' INTERESTS?

[By W. G. McAdoo, formerly Secretary of the Treasury.]

The attacks now being made in the courts and in the Congress of the United States on the farm-loan act, and the great system of agricultural credit banks thereby created, indicate a purpose on the part of the majority leaders to yield to the pressure and influence of the farm mortgage brokers and to destroy or so cripple the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks that the farmers of the country will again be put at the mercy of usurers and mortgage sharks.

A suit was recently brought at Kansas City, Mo., attacking the constitutionality of the farm-loan act. Judge Van Valkenburg, at Kansas City, decided in favor of the constitutionality of the farm-loan law. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the case was recently argued. If the Supreme Court should sustain the constitutionality of the farm-loan act, then the only danger to the farm-loan system is from Congress.

Prior to 1913 there was a severe money stringency at crop-moving seasons. The farmers suffered severely from these annual money squeezes. Inability to get sufficient credit on reasonable terms to harvest their crops and to hold them after harvest for a reasonable time so that they could market them gradually and get the benefit of fair prices resulted each year in the enforced dumping of the crops on the market in a short period of time, with the result that prices fell frequently below the cost of production, entailing grave losses and hardships upon the farmers. Credit was largely controlled by a powerful group in New York commonly referred to as "Wall Street." Doubtless every farmer remembers that in the fall of 1913 the Treasury Department for the first time in its history disregarded "Wall Street" and made direct deposit of Government money in banks in the crop-moving centers throughout the country on condition that the same be lent to farmers for crop-moving purposes at reasonable rates. This broke up the annual crop-moving squeeze, and since 1913 nothing has been heard about tight money and the difficulty of moving the crops.

But this was not enough. The administration realized that unless remedial credit legislation was promptly enacted what the Treasury had gained in breaking the selfish control of credit would be lost. Therefore the Federal reserve act was passed, and while it created a great system of commercial credit, it made provision only for the essential short-time credit needed by the farmer. It put the farmer's six months' notes, given for agricultural purposes such as growing crops or carrying his matured crops when in the form of staple products, upon the same favorable basis as the notes of merchants and other business men when given for commercial purposes.

The farmer's notes of this character were made eligible for rediscount in Federal reserve banks just as were the business man's notes. What does this mean? It means that every national bank can now lend money to the farmer for agricultural purposes or upon the security of staple agricultural products, with full knowledge that it can rediscount such notes in Federal reserve banks upon the same favorable terms that it can rediscount the merchant's paper. This makes the farmer's paper just as desirable to a national bank as the merchant's paper, and opens up to the farmer a vast field of essential short-time credit.

PROVISION FOR LONG-TIME LOANS.

But this was not enough. The farmer also needed a system of agricultural credit under which he could borrow on a mortgage on his farm for a long term of years and at low interest rates and be relieved of high charges for commissions, attorney's fees, and other exactions which, in times past, have made the cost of money borrowed on mortgage, where he was able to get it at all, so high that he could ill afford to bear it. The farmer could rarely borrow on mortgage for a longer period than five years. Frequently he could borrow for a much shorter time only. He had to submit to arbitrary valuations of his property which were not infrequently lower than was justified and he had to take the money upon any terms the lender imposed upon him. The small farmer who wanted to borrow on mortgage, $1,000 or less, found it very difficult to get it on any terms. There was little or no credit on farm mortgage for the small borrower.

The need of mortgage credit to the farmer is very great, because he can not make permanent improvements on his land, or buy machinery, or raise cattle or fruit trees or other crops which take a long time to mature, or clear his land, or tile it, or lime it, and get returns from the additional investment unless he has a long-time loan. It became necessary, therefore, to create a farm-mortgage system which would give the farmer, first, the long-time mortgage loan covering a period of as much as 40 years and repayable on the amortization plan, namely, in annual installments of, say, 1 per cent; second, a low rate of interest, which would be uniform throughout the United States, so that farmers everywhere would share equally in the benefits of the system. This could be accomplished only by the creation of land banks with power to sell a standard form of bonds based upon the security of the farm mortgages they purchased from the farmer. By making these bonds safe and attractive to investors the land banks would be able to command a constant supply of money by sale of their bonds and thus be able to lend upon the security of the farm mortgage.

It was essential that the mortgages given by the farmer and the bonds issued by the banks upon the security thereof should be exempt from all United States, State, and local taxation. Without this exemption, it would be impossible to sell the bonds of the banks at such reasonable rates of interest that the banks in turn could lend money to the farmers on mortgages at a reasonable rate of interest. Consequently, the Congress of the United States, upon the recommendation of the President, passed the Federal farm loan act in July, 1916. Under this law the country has been divided into 12 districts and a Federal land bank has been established in each. These Federal land banks are not permitted to lend more than $10,000 to a single borrower, and they can not lend except upon the cooperative plan through a farm loan association which the farmers have to organize. It was necessary, therefore, to provide another class of banks which could make loans to farmers desiring to borrow in excess of $10,000. Therefore, the act provides for the organization of what is called joint-stock land banks. These banks are permitted to lend direct to a single borrower in any amount up to $50,000. The joint-stock land banks, like the Federal land banks, issue their bonds against the security of the farm mortgages they take. The joint-stock land banks are required to lend on the long-time amortization plan at rates of interest regulated by the Federal Farm Loan Board at Washington, just as in the case of the Federal land banks. The entire system is under the supervision and control of the Farm Loan Board established in the Treasury Department at Washington. Thus a great system of agricultural credit is created, the short-time loans being supplied by the Federal Reserve System and the long-time amortization mortgage loans by the Federal Farm Loan System.

THEIR NEED IS APPARENT.

Although the Federal land banks have been in operation but little more than two years, they have made loans to farmers throughout the United States aggregating $285,000,000 at 5 and 5½ per cent interest, plus 1 per cent per annum for amortization, so that at maturity the principal will have been paid in full if the interest and amortization charges shall have been regularly paid as they became due.

The joint-stock land banks have made direct loans to farmers amounting to something like $41,000,000, at low rates of interest, and on the amortization plan it is evident from the manner in which the farmers are making use of the system that it is serving a genuine need. All of the Federal land banks are now established on a profitable basis, and this farm credit system, conceived in the spirit of helpfulness and cooperation, if not destroyed, can perform a notable service for American agriculture.

The provision that the bonds issued by the Federal and joint-stock land banks and secured by farm mortgages shall be exempt from taxation, and that the rates of interest shall be regulated by the Farm Loan Board and be uniform in all the States, makes it possible for the farmer having good security, even though he lives in a sparsely settled State, to secure credit on just as reasonable terms as the farmer who lives in the most populous and settled State.

But those private money lenders and brokers who for years have fattened at the expense of the American farmer have fought bitterly this tax-exemption feature, because they are now forced into competition with the land-bank system and compelled to lend money on reasonable terms. Threats that the tax exemption on farm mortgages and land-bank bonds would be knocked out by the present Congress have been confidently made by the farm-mortgage brokers of America. The attacks recently made by two of the leaders of the House of Representatives and by one of the leaders of the Senate should serve as a warning to every farmer and citizen interested in the maintenance and success of the land-bank system that they must resist the attempts of these selfish interests if they want the farm-loan system to be preserved.

Representative J. W. FORDNEY, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and Representative MCFADDEN, a member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, have made speeches recently in opposition to the tax-exemption clause, and these speeches are being widely circulated by the farm-mortgage brokers of America.

Senator SMOOT has introduced a bill in the Senate to force the liquidation of the joint-stock land banks, and Mr. MCFADDEN has introduced a similar bill in the House of Representatives. If the joint-stock land banks are thus destroyed and the tax exemption on farm mortgages and land-bank bonds is repealed, the farm-mortgage brokers and private money lenders will again have a monopoly on the field of long-time agricultural credit, and the farmers of the country know what that will mean in high interest rates, commissions, attorneys' fees, and other charges on the original loan and large commissions on each renewal if the farmer succeeds in getting a renewal. The cost of money to the farmer will be increased and all the old abuses will be restored; the mortgage bankers will not grant the long-time amortization loans which the farmer can gradually pay off so that the principal of the debt will be liquidated at maturity. Farmers will have to take short-time loans on such terms as the farm-mortgage brokers and lenders choose to make. In other words, the old system of farm loans with its insufficiency of credit, its usurious rates of interest, its high commissions, and injustices leading only too frequently to the tragedy of foreclosure and loss of everything will be restored.

FAIR PLAY FOR FARMERS.

Why should farmers not have the benefit of exemption from taxation on farm mortgages and the bonds issued by the land banks against these mortgages? What is a mortgage anyway? It is merely an evidence of indebtedness. Why should the Government of the United States tax the evidence of the farmers' indebtedness? What is the bond of the land bank but an evidence of indebtedness issued on the security of the mortgage of the farmer and by means of which the bank is enabled to get the necessary money from investors to lend to the farmer on his mortgage? If a tax is imposed on the Federal and joint-stock land bank bonds, who will pay it? The borrowing farmers, of course. They will pay the higher interest rates which the bonds will have to carry if the tax exemption is removed, because the banks will have to charge the farmers a higher rate of interest on their mortgages. If the farmer has paid taxes on his mortgaged farm and on his income as well, why should he be asked to pay taxes on his debt? The mortgage on his farm and the bond issued by the land bank are both mere evidences of indebtedness, resting upon the land upon which the farmer pays taxes.

Why should this tax exemption, which makes the land-bank system successful and enables it to give the farmer sufficient agricultural credit on long time and at reasonable rates of interest, provoke the hostility of leaders in the Congress when a similar tax exemption has been granted in favor of rich and powerful national banks? We have heard no complaints about this tax exemption. No one challenges it or complains of it. But if the farmers of the United States are given a similar exemption, then it becomes an "outrageous" thing.

The national banks of the United States own all the stock in the 12 Federal reserve banks, which have an aggregate capital of more than $86,000,000. These national banks are permitted to receive 6 per cent preferred dividends on their Federal reserve bank stock, and, in addition, every dollar of that stock and the income therefrom is exempt from all Federal, State, and municipal taxation. All State and municipal bonds issued throughout the Nation are given full exemption from Federal, State, and local taxation. There are millions of these securities in the hands of the wealthy classes. Why should they have the benefit of exemptions which withdraw hundreds of thousands of dollars of their income from all Federal, State, and local taxes? Certainly, a tax exemption which will permit the farmer to get credit on reasonable terms is no more heinous than a tax exemption in favor of the stock holdings of the national banks in the Federal reserve banks and in favor of wealthy people who invest their money in State and municipal and county bonds, the income of which can not be taxed one cent by Federal, State, or local governments.

In order to establish successfully the great commercial credit system represented by the Federal reserve act and the great agricultural credit system represented by the Federal farm-loan act I think that the Congress was justified in granting exemptions from taxation of the stock held by the national banks in the Federal reserve banks and of the farm mortgages and bonds of the Federal and joint-stock land banks; but if the exemptions from taxation in favor of the agricultural credit system are to be repealed, then with equal justification the exemptions from taxation in favor of the commercial credit system should be repealed.

Apparently, in the eyes of these selfish interests, the farmer is entitled to no consideration; and it is equally apparent that in their eyes capital and wealth are entitled to every consideration.

The agricultural class, upon whose prosperity and welfare the life of the people of the United States depends, will not now consent to see this great land bank system destroyed for the benefit of those who for years have taken advantage of the farmer's necessities by selling him credit at extortionate rates of interest and on extremely hard and unsatisfactory terms.

I do not say that there should be no amendments to or changes of the farm loan act. The system is new and the test of experience will undoubtedly show that beneficial amendments of the law may from time to time be made. For instance, I think it would be wise to amend the law so that joint-stock land banks shall not be permitted to make loans on farm lands, except to farmers who will actually engage in the cultivation of the soil and for live stock, equipment, improvements, etc., just as in the case of the Federal land banks. I also think it would be wise to limit the loans which a joint-stock land bank may make to any one borrower to not more than $50,000; this, however, is already covered by a regulation of the Federal Farm Loan Board and may be sufficient for the purpose. These amendments are necessary to prevent the funds of the joint-stock land banks from being used for the buying up of farm lands with money borrowed from the banks by those who will not improve or cultivate it but merely hold it for an advance in values. Our new and admirable agricultural credit system must not be prostituted to speculative ends.

The Federal Farm Loan System must be preserved. The tax exemption on the mortgages given by the farmers to the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks and upon the bonds issued by these banks must be continued so that the great basic industry of agriculture, upon which rests the prosperity of all, will not be burdened unnecessarily. The business of food production is fundamental. No one must be permitted to collect one cent of unjust tribute from it.

The farmers of the United States and all citizens interested in the welfare of the Nation must assert themselves vigorously against any effort on the part of selfish interests in or out of Congress to destroy this great land-bank system which furnishes for the first time in the history of America adequate agricultural credit to the farmers at reasonable rates and on just terms.

The Federal farm-loan act was the farmer's declaration of independence against usury and insufficient credit, as well as against unjust exactions of private money lenders and brokers.

Mr. Speaker, the farm loan act was not passed as a party measure. The agitation for such a law began under a Republican administration. The appropriation for the study of conditions in this country and Europe by a United States commission was made by a Republican Congress, and the law making the appropriation was signed by a Republican President, Mr. Taft. It just so happens that in the whirligig of politics, a Democratic President, Mr. Wilson, named the commission which made the study of and the report on the rural credit systems of European countries. It is a mere accident of politics that the Democrats had a majority of Congress when it came time to pass this legislation. Such a measure was promised in the Republican platform of 1912. The bill was passed by a big vote in its favor without any reference to party alignment. Therefore, speaking as a Republican, I have not hesitated to quote a former Democratic Secretary of the Treasury.

As I said in the early part of these remarks, I have laid particular stress upon the attack against the joint-stock land banks because they are an important part of the farm-loan system, and because the evidence is overwhelming that the attack on the joint-stock land banks is only a part of a general attack to break down the farm-loan system as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, we have a joint-stock land bank in Wisconsin, and it is adapted to our peculiar needs. The Bankers' Joint Stock Land Bank of Milwaukee is performing a valuable service by supplying the capital we need for the development of the northern part of Wisconsin. We have 9,000,000 acres of hardwood cut-over lands in the northern counties of my State—9,000,000 acres of good farming land, adapted to dairy farming; 9,000,000 acres of undeveloped land that is as fertile and that will be as productive as the land in the southern counties of Wisconsin, where we have developed the dairy industry until now it produces milk, butter, and cheese valued at $200,000,000 a year.

Mr. Speaker, I want to see the northern part of Wisconsin as fully developed as southern Wisconsin. We can not develop these lands without the aid of outside capital. And that is why I do not want anything done to cut off our supply of outside money. That is why I do not want any action taken by Congress that will deprive us of the services of the joint-stock land bank. The men who control and operate the Bankers' Joint Stock Land Bank of Milwaukee have brought to Wisconsin to be used in agricultural development a total of more than $10,000,000. Of this amount approximately $5,000,000 has been made available within the last two years by the organization and operation of the joint-stock land bank.

I submit these facts and have engaged in this discussion that the character of the service performed by joint-stock land banks may be known and understood.

Repeal War Measures.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. EVANS, OF MONTANA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, this resolution purports to repeal the war measures and doubtless will repeal some of those measures. It will be noted, however, that it specifically retains the Lever Act, and as to others it is ambiguous and uncertain. Notwithstanding these defects I shall support the resolution on the theory that if I can not get a whole loaf I will take half a loaf.

This measure, like every other measure that has been considered in this House recently, has been brought up under a rule that denies any change or amendment. Members must vote for this particular resolution just as it comes from the committee, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," or they must vote against the whole proposition. I am compelled to vote for this makeshift because I can get nothing better. No man can tell from the reading of this resolution just what laws are repealed. The only positive and affirmative statement in the resolution is that the Lever Act and the trading-with-the-enemy act are not repealed. I have tried to ascertain if this measure repeals the espionage act, but no man here can give me definite assurance on that question.

Mr. Speaker, on the 28th day of April last I introduced in this House a bill framed in positive and unequivocal terms repealing all of the so-called war measures. That bill, like others introduced with the same end in view, was pigeonholed and has slumbered from that day to this, and now, within three days of adjournment, this equivocal measure is brought in to be passed without amendment. What the people want is the repeal of all war-time restrictive and repressive measures. They want to get back to normal. They have waited for more than a year, devoutly hoping for this. They want to be protected in the right of free speech and free expression through their own voices and through the public press of the country. The espionage law was probably necessary during the war, but it should have died with the signing of the armistice.

It was abused during the war and has been abused since the war. Many wrongs have been committed under that law. Some people, moved by patriotic fervor during the war, lost their bearings and, through the processes of the law and the courts, inflicted many hardships on individuals, which injustice they did not merit. Another class of people, Mr. Speaker, to whom I can not be so charitable, taking advantage of the patriotic fervor and excitement engendered by the war, constituted themselves guardians of the community and the country. Men with little standing in their own community, posing as superpatriots, busied themselves by practicing a system of espionage on their neighbors, arresting, harassing, and mobbing them in an effort to ingratiate or reinstate themselves in the minds of the just, patriotic, and fair-minded people of the community. These are the people who brought this law and who bring all law into disrepute. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, there are hundreds of men now languishing in jail, convicted in the excitement of war and under conditions as I have related, that should be released.

In Montana, which I have the honor, in part, to represent, the highest courts, both State and Federal, are now releasing men, realizing that convictions were made where excitement, and not law and justice, held sway. Let us repeal these laws. Let us get back to normal.

The war is over. As Gen. Grant said at Appomattox. "Let us have peace."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAVID J. O'CONNELL,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am going to vote for this bill not because it is in any way adequate but because it is all we can get at this time. Nearly 2,000 of my constituents have written me urging a better wage for these loyal public servants.

Over the entire country a tidal wave of appeal is rolling to sweep the Government into swift action on behalf of the 285,000 employees in the service of the post office. As a request of workers for better wages and better working conditions, this instance is unique. It is unique in that the heaviest volume of appeal is aimed at the employer—the Government—not by the workers but by the consumers, by a vast proportion of the population of the United States. The consumers, I venture to assert, have never been known to indorse and urge an increase of wages when there is question of it, let us say, about meat or coal. They feel shy and hesitant in such a case. It may be because they feel they know where the increase is coming from. But the consumers in the case of the post-office employees—or, to put it more definitely, the beneficiaries of the Postal Service, the people at large—are indorsing and urging fair and proper compliance with the needs of post-office workers, whether they toil under the terrific pressure of offices and carrier routes in great cities or on the remotest, arduous rural routes between Maine and California.

Yet the people know that in the case of postal salaries increases must be added to the general charges of the Government. Nevertheless they are clamoring for an increase of such salaries, regardless of any partisan feeling, as far as they themselves are concerned or those to whom they make appeal. The astonishingly rapid growth of the sentiment, as well as its apparent unanimity, has excited suspicion in some candid minds. Also, as is the psychological law, so direct and forceful a revelation of an idea has stimulated minor opposition thoughts and impressions. "If these post-office people are so terribly underpaid," it is asked in some quarters, "how have they got together the money to raise such a rumpus? It must have cost a fortune." It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the conscientious objectors who view the matter in this light have had their vision dazzled by too close reading of the high cost of being a presidential possibility. They overlook the fact, which you know, that for about a year a searching study of the matter of postal salaries in all branches of the service in all parts of the country has been made under the direction of the Joint Postal Commission. These skeptics seem also to realize that an inquiry of such far-reaching and thorough ramification has made the subject of postal salaries a household word not only in the homes of postal employees but also in the homes of their relatives and friends and acquaintances. Propaganda? By no means! If you call such talk propaganda, then we are a Nation of propagandists, for if there is one topic on which we all, from the richest to the poorest, have been propagandists these many months it is the paralyzing after-war cost of living.

But the heaviest denunciation to which postal employees have been subjected by scornful critics has not been due to the fact that they have received so much support from the people at large, but from the press. Mr. Speaker, the experience of this Government with the press during the war should make even the most exacting mind careful in criticism. When anything was required of the press in the way of publicity the publishers and editors of the country were only too willing to lend their every facility and energy toward the great work of national solidarity on the one objective—to win the war. Through the press great industrial and business organizations, it will be recalled, were enabled to throw the weight of their influence and material effort toward the same end. The press and these same individuals and organizations acted likewise in the colossal campaigns of charity that have been engineered for war-ravaged populations all over Europe. To-day America is a name that is mentioned with a prayer of gratitude in every country in Europe, because it has helped those who needed and who deserved help. No criticism was ever directed against the efforts made to succor these impoverished and needy aliens, even by those superior economists who look upon the post-office employees asking for more pay with much of the indignation and amazement Mr. Bumble displayed when Oliver Twist asked for "More." But these critics are not satisfied with objurgation for the postal employees, who are merely seeking a living wage. They must needs see some nefarious collusion between them and organs that have espoused their cause. It is insinuated that the postal employees will in future be bounden, body and soul, to the support of such organs. To allay the fears of such critics, it should be pointed out that none of the publications which have ever supported drives in behalf of needy aliens counted on receiving in return the quid pro quo of a various subscription list, divided into some such form as this: Belgian section, Armenian section, Jewish section, Serbian section, Red Cross section, Knights of Columbus section, and so forth. What is more, to anybody who knows the slightest about the theory and practice of publishing—and there are many here who have such knowledge—an insinuation of this character is self-destructive through its inherent nonsense.

And while we are on the subject of the theory and practice of publishing, it might be well to remind ourselves of the fact that one of its first principles is to record events and tendencies. It does not create tendencies, but records them and makes them known abroad. Now, the two chief tendencies about the problem of the Postal Service are these: First, the inhuman wage status of the workers, and, secondly, the alarming defection of experienced workers from the various branches of the service, who are being forced out by their inability to live on their present pay.

But an increase in wages will do the post-office workers no good, in the judgment of superior economists, who say that we must wait until there is a general deflation in the land and we all return to a condition where you get more than your money's worth and not less for every dollar you spend. These superior economists tell the post-office employees to wait, and seemingly expect them to wait on an empty stomach. I think even a superior economist would object to working out the highest theories of his economy on anything less than adequate food, clothing, and shelter. These economists say wages and salaries have been notably increased in various lines of business and industry, yet the cry is still heard of the impossibility of making both ends meet. All increases, it is said, are wiped out by the superincrease of the cost of food, clothes, and shelter. They also say that many people are feeling not the pinch of poverty, but the results of their unbridled extravagance in the era of easy getting and easy spending. I shall not stop to analyze the correctness of such a statement on this occasion, because I am concerned with the condition of a multitude of workers who individually or as a class have had no opportunity to indulge in any extravagance—except, perhaps, in the extravagance of hope, which is the one sustaining extravagance of the militant soul. A number of reports have been drawn up by the postal commission which contain an encyclopedia of figures and narratives that are as irresistible in their logic as they are affecting in their human documentary evidence. It is not necessary to do more than glance at some revelations of these records in order to be persuaded of the utter need and the undeniable deserts of the postal employees.

Perhaps nothing could make us see better their condition than to compare their lot with that of some other wage earners, as shown in a memorial to the Joint Commission on Postal Salaries, presented by Branch 2, United National Association of Post Office Clerks of Brooklyn, N. Y. In this we learn that, while a bricklayer receives an average of $10 per day, a post-office clerk receives an average of only $3.48 per day. No one will question the intelligence, judgment, and general efficiency required of the bricklayer. But it must be admitted that a post-office clerk requires these qualities in a superior degree, and is obliged every hour he works to exercise a sense of initiative and responsibility that is indispensable to the conduct of so flexible and complicated a work as his. Again, our $3.48 a day post-office clerk is offered in contrast to the plumber who receives $7, the painter who receives $8 a day, and the window cleaner who earns from $5 to $6 a day. If we take the matter by hours we see the plodding, persistent post-office clerk receiving 43½ cents per hour, contrasted with the longshoreman's hourly pay of from 75 cents to $1. The low compensation of the postal employees, as compared with the compensation received by the workers just mentioned and various others, strikes one more impressively when we take into consideration what the Government, as an employer, asks of applicants for work, as may be judged from the requirements for mail clerks and carriers. In an argument and brief of the National Association of Letter Carriers submitted to the joint congressional commission we read the following:

> There are few occupations for which the applicant must satisfy such rigid requirements. The letter carrier must be a citizen; he must satisfy physical requirements which closely parallel those required for enlistment in the Army or Navy; his references as to character, experience, and ability must be of the best; he must pass a competitive civil-service examination with a grade of at least 70 per cent; and, finally, he is required to furnish a $1,000 bond as a guaranty of his responsibility. Having satisfied all these requirements, he receives, as a rule, appointment as a substitute.
> During his four years as a substitute, and after receiving his appointment as a regular carrier, his duties are complex and responsible, demanding a quick and retentive memory. The carrier's work must be done with infinite accuracy, because he is the last link in the chain of the post-office system for handling mail, and he is the man who is penalized for all errors. He must not only learn the distributive scheme of his route, memorizing several thousands of names and associating those names with the labeled compartments of the post-office distributing case, but he must also assimilate for instant use the Postal Rules and Regulations, which are contained in a book of 800 pages. In time he becomes a veritable postal encyclopedia. He is the responsible fiscal agent of the Government, handling money and valuable mail. He may have to be everything from chauffeur to diplomat, as well as one arm of the Government's information service. He must be honest, sober, loyal, and industrious, as well as neat in his attire. His job also tests physical endurance, requiring him to walk many miles a day with a heavy pack, often through the most difficult weather conditions.
> In short, the letter carrier is a carefully selected, highly efficient, and unusually responsible public servant, whose duties are peculiarly arduous. These facts should certainly place him among the highly paid workers of the country.

But it is not only clerks and other lower-grade employees who are underpaid, for one of the astounding things revealed by the study of the pay conditions of the postal employees is that in some instances men in the service of the Post Office receive less than was paid to the same class of employees 40 years ago. For example, in a brief submitted by the Association of Supervisory Employees of the New York post office we read that "in 1881 the four heads of divisions who ranked next to the assistant postmaster received $4,000 annually. In successive waves of attempted economy they were reduced, notwithstanding the tremendous increase in their responsibilities, until their basic salary to-day is only $3,200 each." To sum up the startling contrast between the salaries of post-office employees and workers in other fields of endeavor, I quote from the table compiled by the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, which shows the following:

	Average salary per hour.
Skilled labor:
Mechanics, etc	$0.81
Trained and expert employees:
Banking and fiduciary institutions, insurance and brokerage concerns, railroad and steamship lines	.80
Unskilled and common labor	.55
Clerical employees of State	.68½
Municipal	.67
Post-office employees	.48½

Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly aware that our superior economists have an argument to demolish all these figures and the significance of them, and this argument is that the post-office employees ought to get out of the post office if they are not satisfied with wage conditions. In fact, we hear it said that no man with any spirit would work continuously in the post office or any other branch of the Government service.

I may say, incidentally, that I do not think the advice of economists, superior or inferior, will lessen or increase this movement of the retirement of the best workers from the Post Office Service. They are guided and driven by the inexorable law of human need. But those who do get out, it must be remembered, are only in the minority. The great majority have been so long in the service that they are absolutely unfitted to engage in any other occupation. So the superior economist wins again with his argument that if they can not get out and can not better themselves, why, let them stay where they are and cease to bother us with clamor and repining. But there is another aspect of this question that concerns the Government in a purely selfish sense. As an employer and as the sole controller and owner of so vast an organization as the Postal System of these United States, it would be courting suicide to permit the growing decline in the efficiency of this great machine. The postal system in all parts of the world has from the beginning almost exclusively been the property and charge of the State. The capacity and completeness of this system is in no small measure an index to the civilization of the State itself. To be negligent of such a member of the body politic of the Nation is to be guilty of two of the most dangerous tendencies in any national system—ignorance and sloth. For full and complete communication between mind and mind throughout the world and in all parts of these United States, we are finally to the heaviest degree dependent on the message of light that comes to us through the mails. It is true not only to-day, but it has been true for more than 20 centuries. In about the year 460 B. C., Herodotus, the father of history, wrote of the Persian system of posts that "neither heat nor cold nor rain nor snow nor sun nor night can stay these couriers on their appointed rounds." That tradition of fidelity to trust, of determination in the performance of such trust, despite the severity of the elements and the chance obstacles of every fateful hour, is adhered to after all these centuries now in our day, whether the worker for the post office be in one of our great centers handling messages of vast import to whole masses of busy populations, or whether he be an R. F. D. carrier climbing some mountain trail to a lonely cabin and bearing for its occupant a few letters and newspapers, a whole store of the treasures of life in the great world outside.

Collective Marketing.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS W. HARRISON,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, the bill under discussion, as amended, reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products.

Be it enacted, etc., That persons engaged in the production of agricultural products as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, or fruit growers may act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce such products of their members; and such producers may organize and operate such associations and make the necessary contracts and agreements to effect that purpose, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, That such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof, as such producers, and conform to one or both of the following requirements:

First. That no member of the association is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein; or,

Second. That the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent per annum.

SEC. 2. That if the Secretary of Agriculture shall have reason to believe that any such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced by reason thereof, he shall serve upon such association a complaint stating his charge in that respect, to which complaint shall be attached, or contained therein, a notice of hearing, specifying a day and place not less than 30 days after the service thereof, requiring the association to show cause why an order should not be made directing it to cease and desist from so restraining trade or lessening competition in such article. An association so complained of may at the time and place so fixed show cause why such order should not be entered. The evidence given on such a hearing shall be reduced to writing and made a part of the record therein. If upon such hearing the Secretary of Agriculture shall be of the opinion that such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is, or is about to become, unduly enhanced thereby, he shall issue and cause to be served upon the association an order reciting the facts found by him, directing such association to cease and desist therefrom. If such association fails or neglects for 30 days to obey such order, the Secretary of Agriculture shall file in the district court in which such association has its principal place of business a certified copy of the order and of all the records in the proceeding, together with a petition asking that the order be enforced, and shall give notice to the Attorney General and to said association of such filing. Such district court shall thereupon have jurisdiction to affirm, set aside, or modify said order, and may make rules as to pleadings and proceedings to be had in considering such order.

The facts found by the Secretary of Agriculture and recited as set forth in said order shall be prima facie evidence of such facts, but either party may adduce additional evidence. The Department of Justice shall have charge of the enforcement of such order. After the order is so filed in such district court, and while pending for review, the district court may issue a temporary writ of injunction forbidding such association from violating such order or any part thereof. The court may upon conclusion of its hearing enforce such order by a permanent injunction or other appropriate remedy. Service of such complaint and of all notices may be made upon such association by service upon any officer or agent thereof engaged in carrying on its business, and such service shall be binding upon such association, the officers, and members thereof: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to the organizations or individual members thereof described in section 6 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, known as the Clayton Act.

This bill is substantially what is known as the Capper-Hersman bill, and is accepted by the patrons of that bill as a substitute.

The bill is criticized by those who represent constituencies antagonistic to agricultural interests—first, as class legislation in favor of the farmer, and second, in their tender regard for the farmer they are fearful that it will enable those inimical to the famer to combine against him for his undoing.

A very casual consideration of the bill will demonstrate the feebleness of both criticisms.

First. Those who are permitted to form these cooperative associations must be "farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, or fruit growers." So that all danger of hostile organizations is practically eliminated.

Second. The object of the associations is to permit, without interference on the part of antitrust laws, collective preparation for marketing and marketing the products of the farm.

The general public and consumers are protected against profiteering on the part of the farmer by these features of the bill:

First. The association is operated only for the mutual benefit of the members, as such producers.

Second. No member shall have more than one vote.

Third. That dividends shall not exceed 8 per cent.

Fourth. The Secretary of Agriculture is given the power to proceed against such associations where their operations bring about an unduly enhanced price of agricultural products.

So that the bill simply authorizes the farmers to organize for cooperation in handling their own farm products, and the consuming public is amply protected from the abuses of such cooperation.

When the farmer goes into the market to buy he is confronted on every hand by great combinations in the articles he must have.

The transportation trade, the fertilizer trade, the agricultural-implement trade, the binder-twine trade, the meat-packers' trade, the trade in all kinds of materials, including the trades using his products as raw materials, work exclusively in great combinations, with the highest priced legal talent employed to keep them within the limits allowed by law.

The individual farmer must cope with these combinations at great disadvantage. This bill, which encourages the farmers to cooperate in the production and sale of their products, must be fruitful of good results.

The agricultural production of this country is by far the most important of all its industries, and directly dependent upon it are more of its citizens than in any other one industry. It is practically unorganized in its effort to secure fair treatment in the markets of this country. The natural result of this is that at present the farming interests are suffering and farm production is on a decline.

The farmers of the country never strike, and their day of toil is not numbered by hours nor brightened by philanthropical schemes of recreation. They must endure the surly blasts of the winter storm and the heat of the summer sun, that the rich and the poor may have sustenance, and they are in no position to profit in the necessities and sufferings of humanity. The profiteering hog will exact out of the farmer the products of his toil at less than living cost, and then grind the face of the poor with the high cost of foodstuffs. It is not the farmer who is receiving the big cost of food. In many lines of production he is working at a loss.

This abnormal condition demonstrates the propriety of the proposed legislation, which will enable cooperative associations of farmers to bring their products, without intermediary, to the table of the consumer.

Surely there is something very abnormal in such a condition. The demands growing more insistent and production less profitable, statistics show the farmer, on all things he must sell, is getting on the average less than 65 per cent advance upon the price he received in 1914, and is paying 185 per cent increase on the price of 1914 for what he buys, including clothing, implements, labor, and so forth.

When the war broke out a fervent appeal was made to the patriotism of the farmer to increase production, and he responded nobly. He was hampered by a price limit being placed on his wheat and by his labor being taken from him and by vexatious laws like the daylight saving act, but in spite of this, God knows how, production was enormously increased.

I sought very earnestly to have farm labor in the selective draft law placed on the same footing as the labor in the munition plants and the shipbuilding plants, but was only partially successful. Through my earnest protest the farm was not absolutely stripped of its essential and necessary labor, but a very strict construction was placed on what constituted necessary labor. A large per cent of farm labor was taken.

Statistics gathered from reliable sources show that a large per cent of the labor has not returned to the farm, and the colored labor of the South which has returned has greatly decreased in efficiency. The workday is shortened and even then the work done is less per hour.

This is not remarkable. City life is more stirring and attractive to youth. Apparently in shortened hours of work and increased pay per day the city labor is better remunerated than farm labor. I use the word "apparently" advisedly, for I believe at the end of a year the farm laborer will find himself better off than his city brother, even though he receives less. He has better living conditions and better opportunities to save.

To all thoughtful people the condition of the American farmer is one of constant concern.

Many helpful laws were enacted during the Wilson administration. The Federal reserve act, giving this country the greatest banking system ever enjoyed by any country; the farm-loan bank act; rural credits; and the Federal aid to public roads are conspicuous instances of such legislation.

The records of Congress will show that in each and all of these matters I have been instrumental in lending a helpful hand, and with the study of conditions, knowledge acquired thereby, and experience in legislation I hope to be of still greater service.

Cooperative associations such as this bill contemplates have been tried under State laws and found very effective. With this legislation such associations will become of very general application and, I believe, will be of very great practical benefit to agricultural interests.

Entertaining these views, I heartily favor the bill and urge all farmers to take advantage of its provisions.

Improvement of the Tombigbee River.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EZEKIEL S. CANDLER,
OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I obtained unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of the Tombigbee River, but I fail to find it in the RECORD and I can not locate the date. I therefore ask unanimous consent again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Tombigbee River. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, under above leave granted to me by unanimous consent of the House of Representatives to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Tombigbee River, I desire to present and call attention to a petition which I received urging the improvement of this river, and urge upon the House and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the justness as well as the importance of the improvement of this historic stream, and the making of an adequate appropriation by Congress for that purpose. The petition to which I refer is the following, which is signed by a number of most excellent and progressive citizens of Itawamba County, Miss., who are familiar with the situation and know and realize the importance of the proposed improvement.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI,
Itawamba County.

To the honorable Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned citizens of said county and State, petition your honorable body to cut off the short bends and straighten and deepen the channel of the Tombigbee River, in the interest of commerce.

We feel absolutely sure the benefits to be secured by the improvement of this river would fully compensate not only this locality but the country at large for the necessary appropriation to do the work required. The improvement of this river would open up to commerce and trade a very large and productive territory.

Respectfully submitted.

With the view of securing the improvement of this river and opening it up for all-the-year-round navigation in the interest of commerce, on April 12, 1920, I introduced the following bill:

A bill (H. R. 13575) to provide for the survey of the Tombigbee River, in Alabama and Mississippi, and the survey of a canal connecting the Tennessee and Tombigbee Rivers.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey and estimate to be made of the Tombigbee River, in Alabama and Mississippi, from Demopolis, Ala., to Columbus, Miss., and from Columbus, Miss., to Aberdeen, Miss., and from Aberdeen, Miss., to Walkers Bridge, Miss., with the view to dredging said river or improving same by constructing locks and dams to secure a depth of 6 feet from Demopolis to Columbus, and 6 feet from Columbus to Aberdeen, and to a depth of 4 feet from Aberdeen to Walkers Bridge, and a survey and estimate for a uniform channel of 4 feet, making the survey and estimate separately in each instance for the sections in said river between the points mentioned above, to determine the feasibility and probable cost to improve said river, and each section between said points, to accommodate the commerce of said river, both present and prospective, and to report to Congress with his recommendations thereon as to the best method to improve said river, the depth of channel necessary, and the probable cost to improve each section mentioned above, and the advisability of such improvement, taking at all times in view the present and prospective commerce.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized and directed to cause a survey and estimate to be made of a canal to connect the waters of the Tennessee River with the waters of the Tombigbee River at the most feasible points on each of said rivers in the interest of and for the improvement of navigation so as to secure an adequate and continuous channel for water transportation of commerce, present and prospective, from the Tennessee River through such a canal and to be connected with the channel of the Tombigbee River and on through the Alabama River to the Gulf of Mexico; to determine the feasibility and probable cost of such a canal in connection with the improvement of said river to accommodate the commerce, present and prospective, and to report to Congress with his recommendations thereon as to the best method to make said improvement, the depth of channel necessary, and the probable cost of the construction of such a canal, and the probable cost of the improvement of said river, each project separately, and then both taken together, taking at all times in view the improvement of navigation and the present and prospective commerce.

This bill provides for the survey of the Tombigbee River in Alabama and Mississippi, and the survey of a canal connecting the Tennessee and Tombigbee Rivers. In the first section of the bill the Secretary of War is directed to cause a survey and estimate to be made of the Tombigbee River, by different sections of the river mentioned, in order to secure a uniform channel of at least 4 feet in depth to accommodate the commerce of said river, both present and prospective, and to report to Congress with his recommendations thereon as to the best method to improve said river, the depth of channel necessary, and the probable cost to improve each section mentioned, and the advisability of such improvement, taking at all times in view the present and prospective commerce. This river has already been improved by the Government of the United States by constructing locks and dams therein at proper distances all the way from the mouth of the river up to Demopolis, Ala. The last lock was constructed near Demopolis and now backs the water up the river above Demopolis and the mouth of Warrior River 16 miles, and the purpose of this bill is to continue exactly this same character of work on up the river to the head of navigation thereon so as to secure navigation all the year round in each and every year.

The second section of this bill provides for a survey of a canal connecting the Tennessee and Tombigbee Rivers at the most feasible points on these rivers so as to enlarge the possibilities of trade and open up to commerce a very large territory by reason of the connection of the Tennessee and its tributaries with the Tombigbee. A glance at the map will readily reveal the great possibility of such an improvement. It would make a system of waterways composed of the Tombigbee, the Tennessee and its tributaries together with the great father of waters, the Mississippi River. In this time of great congestion in transportation facilities we need to develop all of our waterways and natural channels for transportation to meet the ever-increasing demand for the transportation of our wonderful resources.

I earnestly suggest and urge upon Congress and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the most serious consideration of this proposed improvement. The agitation for a canal to connect the Tombigbee River and the Tennessee River with a view of furnishing this great system of water transportation, all of which would thereby be connected up with the Gulf of Mexico and thence through that great gulf out to the Atlantic Ocean and thence to the markets of the world, began as early as 1874. The time has come when it is necessary to utilize all our transportation facilities by water and by rail to meet the necessities of the hour in the wonderful and marvelous and ever-increasing development of trade in this Republic, coming as it does in a continuous stream from the products of manufacture, agriculture, mine, and forest. The consummation of this improvement would bring a new area in development. It would help to meet the evident necessity, arising in this large and productive territory, for transportation of the wonderful resources of this territory to the markets of the world which would be open to them as soon as transportation would be thus provided. This certainly would bring great prosperity to all this territory and give an unbounded impetus to manufacture, agriculture, mine, and forest. The present and prospective commerce I feel sure would fully justify the expenditure by the Government of the necessary funds to inaugurate and carry to completion this wonderful system of water transportation. Therefore, I shall unceasingly and persistently urge upon Congress and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a full and earnest investigation and consideration of this proposed improvement until I hope I shall be able to demonstrate its feasibility and importance and thereby justify and secure an appropriation adequate to carry it to a successful realization and conclusion.

Reclassification of Salaries of Postal Employees.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS H. CULLEN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, a little more than 14 months ago a joint commission was appointed to make a report to the Congress on the reclassification of salaries of postal employees. It was recognized at that time that the condition in the Postal Service in so far as it related to salaries was becoming acute and that relief should be granted.

The report and bill have at last come before the House for consideration, and, to my way of thinking, it is a clear disappointment. No substantial increase has been granted commensurate with the high cost of living, and, in my judgment, will not allay the unrest among the employees.

Mr. Speaker, I have received innumerable letters from the business men of my district and from people in all walks of life, pleading and urging that legislation be enacted during the present session that would give these underpaid employees a living wage with which to support themselves and their families, and relieve the situation which has been forcing scores of competent and experienced men to seek employment elsewhere and thus demoralizing the Postal Service, especially in the large centers.

The salaries of these public employees, Mr. Speaker, have for years been inadequate. Long before the cost of living began to soar these men have found it hard to make ends meet on their salaries. Now that the cost of living has doubled, many of them have been forced to leave the service, while the others, filled with hope and expectation that Congress would enact legislation granting them relief, have remained. But, alas! they ask for a loaf and you give them a slice.

I hope the Senate will see the wisdom of amending the bill so that it will provide for a just and decent salary. If not, I feel that the Government will be the loser. They are human the same as the rest of us, and they will not be able to live as they should on the miserable increase in pay provided for in this bill. They did not ask for charity; they asked for justice.

Postal Service.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, no man in this body can justify a vote against this bill. True, some of us feel that greater increases should be granted to certain employees. However, we should not criticize unless we are fully satisfied that the facts and circumstances warrant such criticism. The salaries provided for have been determined upon after careful consideration by the Joint Commission on Postal Salaries. This commission has labored for months. Hearings have been held in all parts of the country. Every branch of the service has been carefully gone over, and those representing each branch of the service have been given hearings. The result is that this bill represents the unanimous judgment of the members of the commission. Time forbids extensive debate. No amendments to the measure as presented can be made, and it is a question of voting for this legislation as presented or voting against the legislation in its entirety. I do not condemn the report, because I am personally acquainted with the Members of this body who served on the commission. I know them to be the real friends of the post-office employees, and am pleased to accept their conclusions.

It must be remembered that this service now embraces approximately 300,000 men and women. The last Post Office appropriation bill provided for the expenditure of $462,000,000, and without a doubt this amount will be increased to $1,000,000,000 within the next 15 years.

Three increases have been provided for since June 30, 1918. On that date the minimum pay of postal clerks and carriers was $800 and the maximum pay was $1,200. On July 1, 1918, the minimum was increased to $1,000 and the maximum to $1,500. On October 9, 1919, an increase of approximately $200 was given to every employee in the service.

It will be observed that a man who was getting $800 on June 30, 1918, by virtue of this last-named legislation—which was retroactive—drew $1,200 from July 1, 1919, and every man was paid in proportion. The bill now up for consideration allows a minimum pay of $1,400 per year and a maximum of $1,800 a year for clerks and carriers. Therefore, the man who was getting $800 in June, 1918, receives an increase of $600 a year, while the man who is getting $1,800 under this bill also gets an increase of $600 a year. To the original base pay was added the bonus, which amount becomes the base pay under this bill, and added to the bonus and former base pay is added $200 on the average. This is a blunt, short way of stating just what the bill provides. Of course, there are those in the service who will not be satisfied with these increases. I believe, however, that the majority of the employees will appreciate the fairness of this raise.

The annual cost of the legislation effective July 1, 1918, aggregated $40,000,000; the annual cost of the increase given on October 9, 1919, amounted to $35,000,000; the annual cost of increase provided for in this measure will involve an expenditure of approximately $40,000,000, making in all an additional increase in salaries since July 1, 1918, of $115,000,000, so that every clerk and carrier will receive $600 per annum more than he did on June 30, 1918.

In this connection it should not be forgotten that the present Congress recently enacted the civil-service retirement law, insuring all employees of the Postal Service against want when they are no longer able to perform their respective duties as postal employees.

The present standard of high prices must be lowered; the future will see the cost of living reduced. Sound logic forbids our attempting to raise all salaries to meet present abnormal conditions. We must all economize and produce, and thereby make the cost of living fit fair wages. It goes without saying that the standard established by this legislation will never be reduced when the present high tide in the cost of living recedes.

I am hopeful that with this increase and the civil-service retirement law in effect this department will be able in the future to maintain the past high standard of the personnel of the service.

The Post Office Department to-day is the only branch of the Government that comes in direct contact with every home. As a general rule the postal employee represents the best type of citizenship. His duties are at all times the most responsible. He is much respected in the community. There are no better Americans than the rank and file of the men in this service. In season and out of season these employees are on the job. Laboring under a great handicap, these men carried on this work during the trying period of the recent war. They did not strike; they did not complain. They worked early and they worked late. With more work to do and less men to do that work, they were never found wanting.

During my term in Congress it has been my privilege to vote and work for every measure looking toward the betterment of the Postal Service and the paying of a living wage to these efficient and painstaking employees. I have received hundreds of letters from men in all walks of life, all urging the justice and necessity of these increases. I have not received a single protest or suggestion that this legislation should not be enacted. This in itself is the best testimonial to the character of these men and the services they are rendering. I therefore unreservedly and enthusiastically support this measure.

Federal and Private Control of Railroads.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. ANDREWS,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 2, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 14335) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, on December 28, 1917, President Wilson took charge of the railroads of the country under authority granted to him by the Army appropriation bill approved August 28, 1916. The act of March 21, 1918, known as the Federal-control act, prescribed the conditions upon which the railroads were retained and operated by the President through directors general appointed by him. The terms of the Federal-control act were outlined in the main by the message delivered by the President at a joint session of the House and Senate. It also authorized the President to return the roads to their owners at such time as he might choose. In the absence of any action by the President returning the roads, they were to go back to their owners automatically under that law at the end of 21 months after the issuance of the proclamation of peace. On May 19, 1919, the President notified Congress that he would return the roads by the 1st day of January, 1920, and on December 25, 1919, he issued a formal proclamation directing the return of the roads to their owners on the 1st day of March, 1920. Accordingly the roads were returned on that date.

Thus three very important points are clearly disclosed:

1. That the President upon his own motion took charge of the railroads of the country.

2. That they were operated by him from January 1, 1918, to March 1, 1920, two years and two months, through his Directors General, McAdoo and Hines.

3. That the roads were, upon his own motion, ordered back to their owners.

In our study and discussion of the railroad question we should not overlook these facts. They are very significant. If we deliberately disregard them we are bound to reach wrong conclusions. They clearly show that the President was personally responsible for taking control of the roads, for their management during Government control, and also for the tremendous financial loss resulting from their operation by the Government; i. e., $1,375,000,000 for the period of 26 months, with more to follow. Attention is invited to these facts not for the purpose of criticism but for the distinct purpose of refreshing our memories with respect to the true history of the case.

Note also that under Federal control the volume of business was much larger, passenger and freight rates were largely increased, and the service rendered by the roads was much poorer than it had ever been before. Some say that these unfortunate things were brought about by subordinate railroad officials, who sought to discredit Government control and management of the roads for the purpose of forcing their return to their owners. In response to that criticism we should remember that under the law the President had absolute and unlimited authority to discharge anybody instantly who was guilty of such conduct.

Of course, the President could, through his Directors General, McAdoo and Hines, have administered proper discipline at the time for any and all of the mismanagement and the disgraceful wastefulness of the resources of the roads and the demoralization of the forces. If crews and section men and other employees were increased beyond the actual needs of the roads, McAdoo, as Director General, was responsible for it. To say that he did not know anything about it is to plead ignorance of things that his duty demanded that he should know and correct. It is not difficult to ascertain facts in numerous cases concerning the profligate waste of the funds of the roads.

Let us summarize the operations of the roads. The Federal Government gave to the country poorer service at higher rates than had ever been known before. It also increased the financial loss to the National Treasury $1,375,000,000. The taxpayers of the country have been compelled to put up that money; part of it has been secured through loans made by the citizens to the Federal Government at a rate of interest averaging about 4½ per cent.

In this connection recall the fact that part of the funds secured by the Government at 4½ per cent from the citizens was used to pay guaranteed incomes of 22 per cent on some roads, 10 per cent on some, and as high as 64 per cent on one.

I endeavored to secure the adoption of an amendment providing that "such guaranteed incomes should in no case exceed 6 per cent on the actual outstanding capital stock of the carrier." The average net rate of dividend guaranteed by section 1 of the Federal-control act of March 21, 1918, was 11.27 per cent on the outstanding capital stock of the roads. My amendment would have reduced that rate nearly half and saved hundreds of millions of dollars to the National Treasury.

These are a few of the leading facts disclosed by the record of Government control and operation of the railroads.

It is not strange, therefore, that approximately 85 per cent of the people of the country have demanded the return of the railroads to their owners and to private control and management. This transfer, however, could not be made without additional financial responsibility on the part of the Federal Government. The financial credit of the roads had been largely destroyed during the period of Federal control. They could not go out into the market and finance their enterprises as they did before the war. Business had been readjusted, confused, interrupted, absorbed, and in some cases destroyed. A rebuilding process must follow. In fact, the Federal Government has assumed in this business a measure of responsibility to stand behind the roads with financial resources for a short period of time so that they can safely reestablish themselves, stabilize their own credit in the financial markets of the Nation and the world.

We clearly realize that the Federal Government must literally buy its way out of this business and thus help all the people of the country to escape a financial panic. Several men have appealed to me to aid in perpetuating Federal control for a period of two or five years more. They plead with Congress to do so. They were sincere in that belief, and they thought that it would be for the best. But Congress could not stop it even if it had seen fit to enact a law making an extension of two or five years more.

The President, who had served notice that he would return the roads on the 1st day of January, 1920, and afterwards issued his proclamation for their return on the 1st day of March, 1920, would certainly have vetoed any measure that Congress might have passed on that question. Hence, from that standpoint alone Congress would have been wasting its time and energy in endeavoring to do something that was within the absolute control of the President of the United States and upon which he had publicly announced his purpose by an official proclamation. It was the duty of Congress to direct its attention to the enactment of such legislation as would provide as safely as possible for the transition from Federal to private control under the President's order.

Here is the law. What are its provisions? How well do they provide for this great emergency? How many difficulties will be disclosed by actual test? They are likely to be numerous and serious. A new order of things must be established, and patient, thoughtful cooperation is necessary to success.

GUARANTY AND LOANS.

The guaranty to the roads under the terms of the Federal-control act of March 21, 1918, gave to them a net return of 11.27 per cent, measured by their average net earnings for the three years prior to June 30, 1917. Under the terms of the Federal-control act that guaranty would without further legislation have run 21 months after the proclamation of peace in the absence of an order of the President for their return at an earlier date.

The present law reduced the length of time for the guaranty from 21 months to 6 months, thus making a very large saving of several hundred millions of dollars for the National Treasury. Nevertheless, that guaranty under the present law protects the wages of the employees of the roads from the 1st of March to the 1st of September, 1920. By September the business of the roads will, we hope, be sufficient to maintain satisfactory salaries for the employees thereafter. Moreover, the rate of the guaranty, 11.27 per cent, is almost double the ordinary banking rate and will bring to the roads during the six-month period almost as much as the roads would receive at the regular rate of 6 per cent for the entire year.

LABOR BOARD.

The questions of wages and working conditions are to be passed upon under the new law by an adjustment board, and then on appeal by the labor board, which is composed of nine members, three chosen by and representing the employees of the roads, three chosen by and representing the owners of the roads, and three chosen by the President of the United States on behalf of the public, all being subject to confirmation by the Senate. Thus we have substantially a court of equity to pass upon all of these disputes arising between employers and employees with respect to wages and working conditions. With three fair-minded men in each group, the board ought to be able, and as a rule will be able, to settle these questions more successfully and fairly than they have ever been settled before. That board may be reasonably expected to deal fairly and justly with all interests concerned.

I quote from the act as follows:

In determining the justness and reasonableness of such wages and salaries or working conditions the board shall, so far as applicable, take into consideration, among other relevant circumstances:
1. The scales of wages paid for similar kinds of work in other industries;
2. The relation between wages and the cost of living;
3. The hazards of the employment;
4. The training and skill required;
5. The degree of responsibility;
6. The character and regularity of the employment; and
7. Inequalities of increases in wages or of treatment the result of previous wage orders or adjustments.

Are these provisions of the law not fair and reasonable?

In addition to the allowance of this standard return to the roads for a period of six months, a revolving fund of $300,000,000 has been provided as a loan to the roads. We may need assistance especially in supplying proper equipment to meet public requirements in the movement of grain, coal, and other freight. It should be distinctly observed, however, that such advance will be loaned to the roads to be repaid to the Government at a future date. This provision was regarded as a necessity in the restoration of the credit of the roads, the prompt expedition in the interest of the public, and the prevention of serious financial disturbance throughout the country.

We should also recall the fact that the business of some of the roads had been almost entirely diverted to other lines, and consequently upon the resumption of private control those roads would be seriously embarrassed without such aid.

The extension of the standard return and the granting of this loan constitute in full all guaranties on the part of the Government to the roads for financial assistance. Of course, we should not overlook the erroneous statement made by many people to the effect that the Government has given a guaranty for at least two years to the roads for a fixed and definite net return. The law provides that the roads may retain 6 per cent net—5½ per cent for dividends, one-half per cent for betterments—if they earn that amount. Note the fact, however, that the law does not guarantee any payment from the Treasury to the roads to make up any part of that 6 per cent even if the roads should not earn that amount. In fact, the roads might sustain a net loss and even then the Government would be under no obligation to make any payments to them. Moreover, if any of the roads earn more than 6 per cent net, one-half of that excess should be turned over to the National Treasury to be used for the benefit of the roads that do not have a net earning and are in need of assistance. This requirement is considered fair and reasonable as a part of the general plan of restoration. The roads that will have the largest returns for some time to come will probably be those to which larger benefits have been turned under Federal control. Now, it is considered fair and just that the stronger roads should aid to that extent in this work of restoration. This law does not grant to the railroads one single dollar beyond the amount that is believed to be absolutely necessary to aid them fairly well in the restoration of good service for the public. Many earnest students of the railroad question believe that the allowance made in this law will not be sufficient to accomplish the desired results. Loans from the Federal Treasury to the railroads are very undesirable as a public policy. They should be avoided in every possible way. The financial interests of all the people, however, demand and compel at least what has been done in this act.

THE CONFERENCE REPORT.

A strong appeal was made to recommit the conference report when it was called up in the House for final action. If we will reflect carefully upon the parliamentary situation, I think we will readily conclude that a recommitment under the amendment offered by Mr. BARKLEY, of Kentucky, would have left the way clear for the Senate conferees to have forced into the law the labor provisions of the Cummins bill with its anti-strike clause. If the motion to recommit had included instructions to strike out the labor provisions embodied in the conference report and insert in lieu thereof the Anderson amendment previously adopted in the House bill, such motion would probably have been adopted by the House. The Barkley motion to recommit, however, did not include any instructions whatever to the conferees. What, then, would have been the parliamentary situation if the conferees had been assembled under the Barkley motion? The Senate conferees would have had a decided advantage. They would surely have said to the House conferees, "We granted you what you demanded in the prior conference in the labor title in this bill. As the House has rejected what we conceded to you in the former conference report, there is nothing left now within the range of the parliamntary authority of the conferees except the labor provisions of the Cummins bill from which we must now make up a second report."

Under such circumstances it is evident that the Senate conferees would have held a position of decided advantage to force into the law the provisions of the Senate or Cummins bill. The only course that could have been safely and wisely pursued to avoid that result was to vote down the motion to recommit and then ratify the conference report.

Moreover the President had announced on May 19, 1919, and December 25, 1919, that the roads were to be turned back to their owners, and March 1, 1920, was fixed officially as the date. Under this official notification by the President Congress did not dare fail to enact that law by the end of February, otherwise many complications and serious misfortunes would have followed.

SUMMARY.

The important features of title 3 of the present law may be summarized as follows:

The Cummins bill was rejected by the House and so it never became a law. The original Esch bill was rejected by the Senate and so it never became a law.

The original Esch bill was amended in the House upon its original passage by striking out the original title 3 and inserting in lieu thereof the Anderson amendment. The House bill went to the Senate with the Anderson amendment, covering all of the labor provisions of the bill.

When the Senate bill and the House bill went to conference the conferees drafted the provisions contained in the present law from those bills. The labor provisions embodied in title 3 of the present law are largely the same as those embodied in the Anderson amendment of the original House bill.

The Labor Board, however, provided in the law as it now stands, is modified very materially as compared with the similar agency designated in the original House bill. This Labor Board, as you will observe from section 304, is composed of nine members, three representing the public, three the employees, and three the carriers or employers. This board is substantially a court of equity authorized to hear and decide disputes between employees and their employers with respect to wages and working conditions.

This is the first time that such a court of equity has been created under the law for the judicial determination of the rights of employees and employers and the public jointly.

Is not such an arrangement fair and just?

PLUMB PLAN.

The principal opposition to the present railroad law comes from the advocates of the so-called Plumb plan. What are the main features of that plan as disclosed by the House bill 8157 of the Sixty-sixth Congress and the hearings thereon? The first is the purchase of the roads by the Federal Government for cash or interest-bearing bonds of the United States as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury and the owners. The cash used for such purposes would be secured necessarily through taxation or loans.

In the hearings and the public discussions of this question it has been generally assumed that total payment would be made in bonds bearing 4 per cent interest. This transaction would increase the interest-bearing debt of the Government about $20,000,000,000, with an annual interest charge of nearly $1,000,000,000.

What effect upon the market value of Government bonds would be produced by adding that amount to our present interest-bearing debt of $25,000,000,000, making the total $45,000,000,000? Under such circumstances would it be possible to float that amount of bonds at 4 per cent? Could they be passed at par in the market? These questions are answered in part by the present market value of our war bonds.

We should carefully note the fact that the first step in the proposed adoption of the Plumb plan would involve a vast increase of our interest-bearing debt. Some people say that the cost of the roads to the Government would not exceed twelve billions. That alone, however, would be a very large increase to our indebtedness. It should be remembered that official quotations indicate the approximate value of the roads at $20,000,000,000.

It is suggested in this connection that all watered stock should be eliminated. Note the fact that the present railroad law guards securely against further issues of watered stock. It should have been prohibited in former years. The outstanding stock and bonds of the roads affect either directly or indirectly the interests of nearly one-half of the people of the United States, through banks, insurance companies, and estates, wherever the stocks and securities of the roads appear as direct possessions, or as collateral, directly or indirectly. The point to be held steadily in mind is this: The proposed purchase of the roads would add these vast sums to the interest-bearing debt of the country. The advocates of the plan tell us that the earnings of the roads would pay all of these bills and more. In the consideration of this statement we should not forget the fact that the Government lost over $1,375,000,000 on the roads for 26 months. The wisdom and statesmanship of Patrick Henry admonish us to use the "lamp of experience" as our guide at this point.

In the second place, the Plumb plan proposes that the Government, after purchasing the roads, becoming liable for all deficits, taxes, and expenditures in every direction, should turn them over to a board of 15 directors to be operated and controlled absolutely by said board, with full authority to fix wages of all officers and employees of the roads and all other expenditures and create such liabilities as they might deem proper.

This proposition should be studied very carefully in the light of our expenditures obtained through Federal control or management from January 1, 1918, to March 1, 1920. During all of this study Patrick Henry's "lamp of experience" should shine brightly upon our pathway.

How would the Plumb plan operate if it should be applied to farming? Would the farmers of a county, for instance, be willing to enter into a corporation and exchange their deeds for their farms for stock in that corporation and then have all the farms of the county turned over to a board of 15 directors for control and management according to the Plumb plan?

It should be remembered that the board of 15 directors would be composed of 5 members representing the officers and managers of the roads or the farms, 5 representing the employees of the roads or the farm laborers. That board of directors, either for the railroads or for the farming enterprise, would have full power to fix their own wages, hours of labor, and working conditions.

THE TEST PERIOD.

We are now passing through a test period in the transportation affairs of the country, which will evidently disclose important modifications in the present law. We should all maintain a thoughtful frame of mind that will readily accept wise amendments in the interest of all parties. This test is designed to utilize individual capital and initiative to the greatest extent and at the same time conserve the interests of our National Treasury. The use of $20,000,000,000 of private capital in the transportation business will be a tremendous relief to the National Treasury and enable us to readjust our national finances in a more speedy restoration to normal conditions. Whatever our individual opinions may be in regard to different methods of transportation, we must guard wisely the financial interest of the whole Nation through our National Treasury. The tremendous demands of the war are still pressing heavily upon us, and we turn in vain many times in search of resources to meet those demands. All the Federal taxes now resting upon the people of the country were levied by Democratic Congresses; likewise all the tremendous debts still weighing with unmeasured power upon the National Treasury were incurred by a Democratic administration. Hence our Democratic opponents have no chance whatever to complain of the Republicans because of high taxes and vast expenditures. So far the present Republican Congress has been reducing expenditures at every possible point and disposing of public property in every possible way to turn back into the Treasury a portion of the money that was drawn out for the purposes of war. But through all of these financial transactions the question of transportation threads the whole story. As a people we should cooperate to the utmost limit in the restoration of normal conditions according to the best methods that can be devised.

A thorough test of the present law may disclose a permanent policy that should be pursued in promoting the highest welfare of the country. Personally I shall study the results of that test without prejudice for or against any particular plan.

Economy and the National Defense.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Q. TILSON,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, economy is the watchword of the hour. This cry is founded upon wisdom, whether considered from an individual or governmental standpoint. To anyone who has the vision to see more than an inch in front of his nose it should be apparent that this country is riding for a fall unless we have the good sense to draw rein and begin to slacken the speed at which we are traveling along the road of reckless expenditure. Individuals set the bad example. Government simply follows it. Individuals in private life are spending their own money extravagantly. It is frequently stated in Congress that the people do not wish their Representatives in Congress to appropriate the public money with undue liberality, but if we are to judge the sentiment of the people either by their own example or their letters to Members of Congress we shall be forced to the opposite conclusion.

Regardless, however, of the example or precept of the people it is the duty of both Congress, which appropriates, and the executive branch of the Government, which expends, the public funds, to insist upon and practice economy. My voice and my vote shall be upon the side of those who demand the most critical scrutiny of every proposed expenditure of public funds. Holding this view, it might seem to the casual thinker inconsistent on my part to urge in time of peace adequate preliminary preparation for war. My position is entirely consistent, for it can be demonstrated, so far as it is possible to demonstrate anything relying upon history for proof, that proper provision for the national defense is economical as well as wise.

One of the problems always of the greatest interest to me is that of national defense. For many years prior to the outbreak of the war in Europe I was one of those who earnestly advocated a reasonably adequate preparedness for the military defense of the Nation's interests in case of necessity. My speeches on the subject of war matériel in the House of Representatives and elsewhere attest that fact, but they were somewhat like unto the voice of one crying in the wilderness, in that my message was not heeded. Our entrance into the Great War in 1917 speedily vindicated the wisdom of my contention beyond peradventure.

After we entered the war we spent $25,000,000,000 for preparation and a few brief months' participation; and the saddest part of the entire story is that not one-fifth of this fabulous sum produced anything that had any direct bearing upon the conclusion of the war. I do not refer to this by way of fault-finding or criticism of the expenditures, but in order to more forcibly call attention to the inevitable result of the failure to maintain in time of peace a reasonable state of military preparedness.

Long before the war, in calling attention to the importance of reasonable preparedness, I pointed out the method by which it could be done at a comparatively small cost and at the same time showed what it might cost in blood as well as treasure if we failed to do our duty.

My plan was to adopt suitable types of the arms and ammunition most used in modern warfare, prepare in advance the necessary special tools, gauges, dies, jigs, and fixtures, but not to manufacture except for peace-time use and a small reserve. If war should come, we should be ready to produce these articles at once and in quantities. If war should not come, so much the better.

Only a very short step along the line of my plan had been taken when war came. What happened is history. The cost in dollars is about twenty-five billions, and without doubt a considerable number of priceless lives. One-tenth of one billion dollars properly expended during the three years preceding the war would have borne fruit to the extent of five billions saved in 1917 and 1918, besides the delivery of the necessary articles in time for use in the war. The net result of our course was that we fought the war with foreign arms and ammunition, while thanking God that we had associates in the war who could furnish them. What would have happened to us had we been compelled to go it alone in such a struggle is best left to the imagination.

The war is over, but the problem of preparedness has not been solved. The nature of the problem has changed somewhat, but the necessity for an early solution is even more urgent than ever. The general plan should be the same as that originally advocated by me, which consists, first, in making a thorough study of such necessary matériel as by reason of its complicated character requires a long time to produce; second, in making preliminary preparation of the necessary special tools and appliances for quantity production; and, third, in actually producing and keeping on hand such limited reserve as might be deemed necessary for immediate use in an emergency.

The sudden ending of the war left us a considerable number of excellent cannon, practically complete or nearing completion. Enough of these should be completed to equip an army of at least 3,000,000 men, because the experience of the war proved that it requires considerable time to produce such guns.

The machine-gun and automatic-rifle situation is now even better than the artillery, in spite of the fact that during the war it was necessary to use the French Hotchkiss heavy machine guns and the Chavcat automatic rifle for ground fighting. The celebrated Brownings, light and heavy, were not ready in time to cut any figure in the war. However, there have been enough of them finished up since the war to increase our grand total of machine guns and automatics to something like 200,000, including a considerable number of the Lewis, the Marlin aircraft, and the Vickers.

As is well known, we manufactured the modified British Enfield rifle for the use of the greater part of our men during the war for the very sufficient reason that we were not prepared to produce the Springfield in anything like sufficient quantities. Our private rifle manufacturers had been making the Enfield rifle in large quantities for Great Britain and were equipped with all the necessary special tools, needing only slight modifications to produce a rifle chambered for the American service ammunition. The change was made promptly, and a sufficient number of this type of rifle were produced in time to serve our needs.

The task immediately confronting the Military Establishment is first to make a thorough study of the needs of any future army to be created, so far as that can be done in advance; second, to conserve such suitable matériel as was left as a result of the enormous expenditures of the recent war; and, third, to carefully preserve for future emergency use all the necessary special tools, gauges, dies, jigs, and fixtures used in the production of rifles, machine guns, parts of large guns, ammunition, and other articles requiring nicety of construction in order to secure accuracy in functioning. These should be added to from time to time as newly developed matériel may make advisable.

Wise and far-sighted conduct of the military department of the Government along the lines herein indicated during the next five years will mean much for the best interests of our national defense during the succeeding 50 years. When we consider that it was thoroughly demonstrated during the war just ended that the task of providing matériel for an army is far more difficult and requires much longer time than the raising and training of the army itself, the vital importance of the problem becomes apparent. Here is where the element of economy enters. A thousand dollars properly expended in the right kind of preparation in time of peace will not only save a million dollars when the emergency comes, but will be certain to produce something ready for use during the emergency and may even prevent the emergency altogether. I envy the man whose mind and hand shall guide this work through this critical period. He will have the opportunity to write his name large among those who have wrought effectively for the welfare and future safety of a great people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. LARSEN,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when I was a boy I used to read of the dish that ran away with the spoon, and how the cow jumped over the moon. Little did I think I would ever see the day when such extraordinary feats would be considered commonplace, but the calf of to-day, whose skin is manufactured into shoes, as a high jumper at least, excells its fabled relative. No one seems able to explain just why the modern-day cow jumps so high. All agree she jumps too high and that the Department of Justice should see that the proper remedy to prevent it is applied. It has ample authority and in the interest of the public should do so.

Only recently a retail shoe dealer in Washington testified before a Senate committee that the ordinary rule for fixing the selling price of a shoe was to add 66 per cent to what the retailer paid for it. But testimony before the Census Committee is to the effect that shoes manufactured at from $9 to $9.60 per pair retail at from $16 to $18 per pair, and sometimes more. In other words, it seems that the 66 per cent rule no longer prevails and that the retailer makes the Dutchman's profit of 1 per cent, or twice the cost. As the matter now stands the manufacturer blames the jobber and the retailer for high prices, and they in turn lay the blame at the door of the manufacturer. In the meantime the people suffer.

The Senate investigation further shows that a Washington firm in 1914 made net profits of $2,044; in 1917, $18,743; and in 1918, $64,743. These were net profits after paying all expenses and taxes and allowing $5,200 salary to each of the two partners and $6,500 to a manager.

This startling testimony gives excellent opportunity for some head of the department to take charge of the situation personally without leaving home, and, under the very eaves of the Capitol, give the country a practical demonstration of law enforcement against profiteering.

It is assumed that conditions in Washington only reflect similar conditions in many other sections of the country. If so, a man with a 50-acre farm, six children and a wife to be fed and clothed, will have to sell his farm to buy shoes or let his children go barefooted.

I do not know what the Kreider bill will do to relieve the situation. The author claims it will do a great deal. Being a shoe manufacturer himself, his opinion should be valuable.

When the bill was before the Census Committee, of which I am a member, there was considerable difference of opinion as to its merits. In order to relieve opposition and perfect the proposed measure so that it might result in real benefit to the ultimate consumer and the man who raises the animal from which shoes and other leather goods are manufactured, I offered three amendments, all of which were accepted by the committee and are now included in the bill.

The amendments provide that packers, abattoirs, butchers, tanners, jobbers, dealers, wholesalers, importers, and exporters of hides and skins, will not only be required to report as to classes of hides and skins owned or stored, but also as to quantity and class of such products disposed of during the preceding census month.

The tanner will not only be required to report the quantity and class of hides and skins in the process of tanning and manufacture, but also as to quantities and amount of finished products for the preceding month.

The tanners, jobbers, wholesalers, importers, exporters, and establishments cutting or consuming leather, will not only be required to report the quantity and class of leather owned or stored, but also as to goods manufactured during the preceding month.

The effect of these amendments is such that the dealer in hides and skins will not be able to say to the producer that he has on hand a million pounds of hides, or any particular kind of hides and skins, of which he has been unable to dispose and that market conditions are such that he can not do so. The report will show the facts and he can not justify efforts to claim an excess production on market and inability to handle, and thus force a depreciation in the price of such commodities.

The tanner will not be able to justify a claim that the demand for leather is such that he is forced to curtail operations, because his monthly report will show exactly what has been done.

The tanners, jobbers, wholesalers, importers, exporters, and establishments cutting and consuming leather being required to report the quantity and class manufactured each month, everyone should be able to ascertain exactly what is going on and whether there is a real shortage or a surplus in hides, skins, or manufactured products.

Had such machinery as this been put into operation prior to the war, we would have known exactly what we were doing during the war, and could easily have ascertained our demands and the probability of meeting them. Under conditions existing propaganda was sent throughout the country saying there existed a great shortage in hides, skins, and leather. While most of us doubted this, no one was able to furnish proof to the contrary, and the result was that shoes and other leather goods soared to unreasonable prices.

Under provisions of the bill as amended, the Director of the Census estimates that the necessary information contemplated by the bill can be gathered and distributed to the public at a cost of about $3,000 per month. Fortunately, the Government already has in operation necessary machinery. It has heretofore gathered such information as to production and consumption of cotton and similar products, and the wonder is that we have delayed so long the gathering and dissemination of information contemplated by this bill.

Budget System.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. LARSEN,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House. Much has been said in the Congress and throughout the country concerning the "budget system." If one-half the things said by its proponents are true, it should be adopted by a standing vote without debate. But, if it is fraught with the evils which opponents of the measure declare, there is doubt as to its wisdom.

I regret that my convictions, either as to its merits or demerits, are not very strong or well defined. I am, however, certain of the extravagance of appropriations continually being made by Congress, and of the wasteful course pursued by many of those intrusted with disbursement of public funds. I am not convinced that the proposed system will save $100,000,000 per year, as is claimed by some Members, but I am quite sure that some scheme should be devised whereby much more than that amount should be saved.

It has been correctly stated that the Nation has no money which the Congress can appropriate except that taken from the pockets of the taxpayers of the country. This fact should make the Congress careful in the levying of any tax. Under the system now in vogue we have all become so accustomed to taking money from the other fellow's pocket for purposes of taxation, that we do so with little hesitation or compunction of conscience. Apparently, most of us see little difference between an appropriation of $1,000,000 and one of $1,000,000,000, and I regret to say that we do not always discern whether it is to be used in the interest of wealthy corporations or to benefit the toiling masses. Favoring strict economy, and being opposed to all unnecessary appropriations, I am willing to give the "budget system" a trial.

With me the desire for economy and retrenchment of governmental expenditures is real. I have to the best of my ability directed my efforts along these lines since becoming a Member of Congress. I have gone further than mere legislation by vote and on more than one occasion have attempted to exercise influence with those intrusted with the expenditure of Government funds in an effort to prevent undue extravagance. To this end I call attention to a letter written by me November 8, 1919, to Mr. E. C. Morse, Director of Sales, War Department, Washington, D. C., regarding sale of cotton, cotton linters, and so forth, as follows:

NOVEMBER 8, 1919.

Mr. E. C. MORSE,
Director of Sales, War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I note from your publicity statement No. 231, dated November 6, 1918, that the Director of Sales announces that the War Department has entered into a contract with Mr. Ellis P. Earle, 165 Broadway, New York, N. Y., to sell for the Government the entire surplus of cotton linters, amounting to approximately 700,000 bales; that Mr. Earle is to offer the linters in the best markets that prevail, whether domestic or foreign; is to complete the sale within 12 months, if possible; and that he shall receive as commission for his services 2½ per cent of the net proceeds for which the linters are sold at points of Government storage.

I also note that this surplus consists of 49,734 bales of bleached cotton linters, 423,441 bales of munition cotton linters, and 197,543 bales of mattress cotton linters.

While your circular does not so state, I am informed that these linters were purchased by the Government last year upon the following basis: A grade mattress linters, 10 cents; B grade, 8½ cents; and C grade, 6 cents; that munition linters were purchased at 4.67 cents.

I understand that the bleachers are probably the result of Government bleaching. That in such process the normal loss is about one-third, and that, figuring such loss and cost of bleaching, this grade probably cost the Government about 7 cents. Assuming that this is correct, I would conclude that the said linters to be offered for sale must have cost the Government an approximate sum of $19,530,957.35, most likely more than less.

I am also advised that such linters as you propose to sell are now worth on the market from 7½ to 9 cents, but assuming that they are only worth 5 cents, the Government should receive from the cotton which Mr. Earle has contract to sell, $17,500,000 as a minimum less sale commissions. Upon this basis Mr. Earle's commission would be $437,500.

As a taxpayer and Representative of the people, may I be permitted, without giving offense, to inquire of you whether I am approximately correct in my information and conclusions as above stated? If I am, you will please consider this as my earnest protest against such proposed action on the part of the Government or any individual who may be authorized to act for it.

I was raised on a cotton farm and have lived in a cotton-producing section all my life; we have never considered the selling of cotton a matter that demanded such great skill as to resort to the necessity of paying such enormous prices for such services as it appears the Government now proposes. But assuming that the commissions to be paid are reasonable, is it not possible among the great number now in the employ of the Government, that one person can be found who at the salary he now receives would be both competent and willing to render the service which Mr. Earle has been employed to perform? Other surplus property, much of which is very valuable, is being sold by Government officials and therefore I am at a loss to understand why an exception should be made in this particular case, and why Mr. Earle should be paid about one-half million dollars of the Government's funds raised by levy of tax upon the toiling masses.

Awaiting your prompt explanation, and with a sincere trust that steps may be taken to safeguard the people's interest, I am,

Very truly, yours,

W. W. LARSEN.

I also direct attention to letter written under date of April 3, 1920, to the United States Shipping Board regarding contract for salvage of ships at Savannah, Ga., and elsewhere throughout the country, as follows:

APRIL 3, 1920.

The UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: My attention has been directed to an article appearing in the Savannah Press (a Georgia publication) under date of March 24, 1920. The purport of the article is to the effect that the United States Shipping Board has employed Rogers & Co., of Washington, D. C., to salvage ships on a considerable number of yards, upon contract providing that the said company shall be paid as compensation $5,000 for each hull disposed of, and, in addition thereto, receive whatever sum may be realized from the sale or disposition of such ships.

The article states that among the ships thus to be salvaged are two hulls on the yards of the National Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. at Savannah, Ga.; that, while the ships are of wood construction, they are of the finest quality, type, and design which the Government could command and produce in a war emergency; that one is about 20 per cent and the other 38 per cent complete; and that they cost the Government approximately from $350,000 to $400,000.

If I may be furnished the information, I would like to ascertain whether any such contract as the one referred to has been let to any company. I assume that the circumstances are such as to justify any contract that may have been let, but inasmuch as I fail to see the necessity for salvaging such ships, as well as the wisdom of doing so upon the basis stated, I will especially appreciate any enlightenment that I may be given upon the subject.

Is there no one on or with the Shipping Board, or in the employ of the Government in any capacity, capable of performing such salvage service for the Government as may be necessary or advisable? If so, why can he not perform the service to advantage at the salary he now receives? If no such person is in the employ of the Government, is it not possible to procure some competent party upon a basis at least apparently more reasonable?

Trusting that my inquiry may not be deemed offensive, and that the information sought is not of such nature that in the public interest it should be withheld, I am, with sentiments of high regards,

Very truly, yours,

W. W. LARSEN.

I do not know what ultimate good has, or may, come to the public by reason of such protests as I have made, but they at least received respectful consideration of the officers to whom directed, and I trust may be fruitful in preventing subsequent extravagant expenditures of Government funds.

Ireland's Cause is the Cause of Freedom—The Principle of Self-Determination is No Principle at All if it is Not Applied Universally.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, after considerable deliberation, and after hearings that have exhausted the subject, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, consistent with the traditions of the American people, has reported favorably to the House the following concurrent resolution:

Whereas the American people have always sympathized with the aspirations of every people seeking political freedom; and

Whereas the people of Ireland have shown unmistakably their desire to govern themselves; and

Whereas the conditions in Ireland to-day consequent upon the denial of that right endanger world peace; and

Whereas in particular the unrest caused by these conditions is inevitably reflected in these United States of America, tending to weaken the bonds of unity and the ancient ties of kinship which bind so many of our people to the people of Great Britain and Ireland: Therefore, in the interest of world peace and of international good will, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the House of Representatives views with concern and solicitude these conditions and expresses its sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, is consistent with the traditions of the American people, and is the necessary corollary of our high-minded position in the World War.

The House of Representatives of the United States, in the Sixty-fifth Congress, passed a resolution that the peace conference, at that time sitting in Paris, would favorably consider the right of Ireland to self-determination, and the United States Senate, by a vote of 60 to 1, went on record as favoring the efforts of the Irish people to secure a government of their own determination.

President Wilson himself stated in an address at Arlington, Va., that—

One of the principles which America held dear was that small and weak States had as much right to their sovereignty and independence as large and strong States.

The fourteenth of the President's points in his great speech of January 8, 1918, to a joint session of Congress was that—

A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

In his peroration in that epoch-making speech the President said:

We have spoken now, surely, in terms too concrete to admit of any further doubt or question. An evident principle runs through the whole program I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak. Unless this principle be made its foundation no part of the structure of international justice can stand. The people of the United States could act upon no other principle; and to the vindication of this principle they are ready to devote their lives, their honor, and everything that they possess. The moral climax of this the culminating and final war for human liberty has come, and they are ready to put their own strength, their own highest purpose, their own integrity and devotion to the test.

When the armistice was asked for by the Imperial German Government the 14 points had been accepted by the Allies with the sole reservation that the freedom of the seas question be reserved to discussion at the peace table. The other details of the program were accepted as laid down. Our allies, as well as our enemies, adhered to the principle before the peace council sat at Versailles.

National aspirations—

Said Mr. Wilson, speaking before Congress on February 11, 1918—must be respected; people may now be dominated and governed only by their consent. Self-determination is not a mere phrase.

The history of the Irish people speaks for itself, and no orator can paint in more glowing terms her great love for freedom than does the true historian who records the bold facts of her sacrifices for liberty.

Men of Irish blood have demonstrated their ability to govern in every country of their adoption; they have fought for freedom under every flag. Are they to be denied it under their own?

With the disintegration of the enemies of the United States in November, 1918, there was recorded forever the death of the insidious doctrine of the divine right of kings. Out of the ashes of the empires that fell there sprang Phœnix-like into the clear sunshine five Governments, whose own people determined their own power—Poland, Armenia, Finland, Czechoslovakia, and the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes.

Poland, after three partitions among the Governments of Prussia, Austria, and Russia, has again taken her place among the nations of the world on an even footing, recalling to her the golden era of King John Sobieski.

Armenia, which country received Christianity from men who personally knew the author of it, and which has since been a subject race, with the exception of a few centuries, has been recognized by the Allies as a free and independent people.

Finland, hidden for years under the dark cloak of Russian autocracy, faces the coming years with a confidence born of her new strength.

Czechoslovakia, that wonderful land encompassed in the rolling hills of Central Europe, no longer hears the footfall of the oppressor, but sings her own national anthems and makes her own law, free and autonomous.

No longer do the double eagles of the Hapsburgs swoop low over the lands of the Serbs, but they are, with their brethren in arms of the western world, their own masters, their own chiefs.

If it is answered that these nations in part owe their liberty to the dismantling of the governments of our enemies, the answer is unmistakable that their governments are formed on the principles, known through the ages, outlined, it is true, by President Wilson but, above all, accepted by our associates in the war.

A principle to be a principle must be applicable universally. It can not be good only when it benefits and wrong when it harms the nation that guides itself by it.

No nation loves fair play more than does the United States. Self-determination can not be applied to all nations to the exclusion of Ireland. If it is, it is a mockery.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution will pass.

Postal Salary Increases.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. RAINEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I received word from Chicago where a mail carrier, whose salary is $1,500 per year, on which he supports his wife and three children, was forced to vacate his apartment because his rent was raised from $18 to $30 per month and he was unable to pay for a moving van, so his associates at the station to which he was assigned joined together and carried his furniture and belongings through the streets to a flat which he secured at a more reasonable rent.

Continued protests say the men are not able to provide their families with the necessaries of life. The wives and children have been forced to go to work in order to exist.

Last August the Bureau of Labor Statistics, a Government institution, figured that an American family of parents and three children residing in one of the larger cities could not live in accordance with American standards, that is to say, with reasonable comfort and an eye to the future, on less than $2,262.47 a year.

In this budget the man was allowed a hat and a pair of gloves every two years, an umbrella every three years and an overcoat every four years. The wife was expected to get along with a suit every two years and a coat every three years. Nothing was allowed for books or magazines, nothing for furniture or furnishings, nothing for moving expenses, stationery or postage, nothing for funeral expenses.

Failure to substantially increase salaries is false economy and has and will continue to destroy the efficiency of the Post Office Department.

When we realize the ability required of the clerk—his work is highly specialized—it takes a long time to become efficient; it requires training and hard study memorizing thousands of intricate systems of classification, and men who have devoted their lives to the Government are receiving salaries insufficient on which to live. If these men applied the same industry and ability in some commercial lines their salaries would be many times greater.

Letter carriers nowadays remind one of a moving van, with the large packs they are compelled to carry in all kinds of weather and under the most disadvantageous conditions they must cover their routes on schedule time.

I listened with attention to my colleague, Mr. MADDEN, who has given much time and study to this question, and was pleased to learn that the men qualified to speak for these employees, while not entirely satisfied with this bill, are appreciative of the increases allowed.

I believe in the American policy of fair play and regret that the proposed increase is not more substantial, but it is a step in the right direction, and I sincerely hope that in the near future a bill will be passed in Congress carrying a just compensation for these faithful and loyal workers.

POSTMASTERS—FOURTH CLASS.

Compensation of postmasters of the fourth class is fixed on the basis of the whole of the box rents and commissions on stamps canceled on matter mailed at their offices.

Under the basic law postmasters were allowed 100 per cent on the first $50 canceled, 60 per cent on the next $100, 50 per cent on the next $200, and 40 per cent on the remainder.

The act of July 2, 1918, provided that postmasters of the fourth class should receive 100 per cent on the first $80 or less canceled per quarter, and where the compensation did not exceed $50 for any one quarter they were allowed an increase or bonus of 20 per cent of the compensation allowed under existing law.

The act approved February 28, 1919, making appropriations for the current fiscal year, provided that postmasters of the fourth class should receive 100 per cent on the first $100 or less per quarter, with a proviso that if the compensation did not exceed $75 for any one quarter they should be allowed an increase of 20 per cent of the compensation allowed under existing law.

House joint resolution of November 8, 1919, allowed all postmasters of the fourth class a bonus of 15 per cent on the compensation under existing law.

The commission recommended that postmasters of the fourth class should be allowed all the box rents collected and 140 per cent on cancellations of $75 per quarter or less, 115 per cent when the cancellations were over $75 and not in excess of $100, and when the cancellations exceeded $100 per quarter 100 per cent on the first $100, 75 per cent on the next $100, and 60 per cent on the remainder. When the compensation amounts to $1,000 and the gross receipts amount to $1,500 within one year, fourth-class offices shall be advanced to the third class. It is estimated this would advance 3,400 fourth-class offices to the third class, and three additional grades were provided for them in the third class, with salaries as follows:

Gross receipts:	Salaries.
$1,500 but less than $1,600	$1,000
$1,600 but less than $1,700	1,100
$1,700 but less than $1,900	1,200

There were 20,360 offices, as shown by the returns for the quarter ended December 31, 1919, where the cancellations did not exceed $75, 3,669 officers where the cancellations were from $75.01 to $100, and 18,043 offices where they exceeded $100 per quarter.

The bill as amended in conference provides that commissions of 145 per cent shall be allowed on cancellations of $75 or less per quarter, 120 per cent when the cancellations are over $75 and not in excess of $100, and when the cancellations exceed $100 per quarter, 115 per cent on the first $100, 75 per cent on the next $100, and 60 per cent on the remainder.

At 20,363 offices where the cancellations do not exceed $75 per quarter, on the basis of returns for the quarter ended December 31, 1919, the annual compensation will aggregate $4,262,030.88, with gross receipts of $3,929,043.48, and the excess of compensation over receipts $332,987.40.

At 21,712 offices where the cancellations exceed $75 per quarter, based on the same returns, the compensation will aggregate $15,992,029.56 and the gross receipts $19,970,354.08.

The annual compensation for all fourth-class offices, based on the returns for the quarter ended December 31, 1919, will total $20,254,060.44 and the gross receipts $23,899,397.56.

CLERK HIRE, THIRD-CLASS OFFICES.

Allowances for clerk hire for third-class offices have always been made from lump-sum appropriations. The act of February 28, 1919, increased the maximum allowance which might be made in each grade 50 per cent. The continuance of lump-sum appropriations for such allowances is recommended, the maximum allowances to be readjusted to the new scale of salaries as follows:

Postmasters' salaries.	Present maximum allowance.	Maximum allowance proposed by commission.
$1,000	[1]	$450

The commission recommends that the allowances for clerk hire at third-class offices shall be readjusted annually.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF STATIONS—FIRST-CLASS OFFICES.

There are at present 896 superintendents of stations whose salaries, including increases under the war bonus, H. J. Res. of November 8, 1919, and the Wadsworth amendment were as follows: 723 at $1,925; 36 at $2,025; 48 at $2,125; 82 at $2,300; 5 at $2,500, and 2 at $2,625.

The commission proposed to determine the relative importance of stations by the number of employees and gross receipts providing that where the number of employees was less than 4 and the receipts less than $100,000, the salary of the superintendent shall not be greater than that of a special clerk.

At classified stations having 4 employees or more the commission proposed salaries for superintendent as follows:

4 and not exceeding 6 employees	$2,100
7 and not exceeding 18 employees	2,200
19 and not exceeding 32 employees	2,300
33 and not exceeding 44 employees	2,400

ASSISTANT SUPERINTENDENTS OF STATIONS—FIRST-CLASS OFFICES.

There are at present 185 assistant superintendents of stations whose salaries, including increases under the war bonus, House joint resolution of November 8, 1919, and the Wadsworth amendment, were as follows: 169 at $1,925; 11 at $2,025; 5 at $2,125.

The commission proposed that assistant superintendents of stations may be appointed with salaries as follows:

65 and not exceeding 90 employees	$2,250
91 and not exceeding 120 employees	2,370
121 and not exceeding 150 employees	2,400
151 and not exceeding 350 employees	2,600
351 and over	2,800

In fixing the grades of superintendents and assistant superintendents of stations, in addition to the number of regular employees assigned to a delivery station, each $100,000 receipts is to be considered one employee, and at finance stations $25,000 to be considered one employee.

Making a Hat.

OF

HON. JOHN Q. TILSON,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the permission granted by the House, I here insert some remarks made by me in the conference room of the House Office Building on Tuesday evening, May 11, 1920, on the subject of the manufacture of fur hats. Hon. JAMES P. MAHER, a Representative in Congress from the State of New York, presided over the meeting. In calling the meeting to order, Mr. MAHER said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I have been selected by my colleague, Mr. TILSON, to preside over this gathering to-night. I believe that his reason for selecting me as the presiding officer was the fact that I served my apprenticeship at this trade and worked at it all my life until I was elected to the House of Representatives. I do not wish to go into the fine points of the trade, but I can assure you that in looking at this board containing these exhibits it brings back some very pleasant memories to me and some very interesting ones.

"I now have the pleasure of introducing to you my colleague, Mr. TILSON. [Applause.]

"Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, as the time approaches to lay aside the felt hat and put on the straw it seems opportune before we cast aside the winter's lid to pay a word of tribute to the felt hat; at least sufficient to explain something about how it is made.

"Comparatively few people know how a hat is made or even what is the material of which it is made. That this is true was brought home to me quite forcibly the other day when talking about it to a prominent newspaper man. He asked me what I was going to say about making hats. I said, 'Well, I am going to follow the making of the hat from the time the rabbit is caught in Australia until the bow is put on in Danbury.' He replied, 'What has a rabbit in Australia got to do with making hats?' When informed that they are made of rabbit fur, he said, 'I had supposed they were made out of a mixture of wool and cotton.'

"It is quite appropriate that I should speak on this subject at this time rather than at some other time when it takes on a partisan tinge. When it becomes a vital question whether hats have a duty on them or whether they shall be permitted to come in free from other countries, then it is difficult to speak or be accorded a hearing free from partisan bias. At this time, when labor conditions are abnormal, when production is short, when there is all the market that the hat manufacturers want for all the hats they can produce and for almost everything else, there is no object in presenting the claims of the hat for a protective duty under present conditions, and people will hear without prejudice and learn something about the subject that may be useful hereafter.

"During the war I was accustomed to give kindergarten lectures to the Members of the House over on the floor and used as exhibits guns of all kinds and descriptions, so that my colleagues gave me the affectionate name of the 'gunman.' Now that the immediate use of guns has passed by, I have thought that I might render a service even more useful by taking up after the same manner something along peaceful lines. Hats being one of the very important industries of the country and being centered to a large extent in my own State, I thought it well to begin with hats. I believe you will agree with me before we get through the evening, and after you have seen the pictures that are to be shown you later, that the making of a hat is quite an interesting operation or series of operations.

"I looked up an article in an encyclopedia to see what it had to say about the origin of making hats. After reading it through I decided that the man who wrote the article knew just about as much about the origin of making hats as I did. In view of the fact that the writer of the article was not very certain of his ground, I abandoned the idea of trying to enlighten you upon that side of the subject. I shall refer to but a single bit of tradition, and this because I believe that my friend from New York [Mr. MAHER], being a Knight of St. Clement, will corroborate what I have to say. The tradition is that St. Clement being footsore and weary, his sandals being somewhat rough to his feet and the weather being inclement, tried the plan of putting a rabbit pelt between his feet and his sandals.

"After a while, as a result of the motion of his feet in walking, the heat from the body, and the dampness, he found that he had produced a piece of felt. It has been handed down by tradition that the idea of making felt hats from rabbit fur developed from the results of this homely experiment. Whether this tradition is correct as a historical fact or not, it is true that felt is made in just that way—by the combined application of warmth, moisture, and motion to rabbit fur.

"If you will look at a piece of fur through a powerful microscope you will find that it is covered with what are called spines or barbs, all projecting in one direction. Bringing together a number of these barbed particles of fur and wetting them with hot water, then properly manipulating them with continued applications of moisture, warmth, and motion, they become interlocked in this manner [indicating with the fingers of both hands]. This is the initial operation. Every movement brings them closer together, while the barbs make it impossible for them to come apart. This interlocking of the fur is called felting. Then follows a series of operations in which by means of skillful manipulation, such as only an expert like Brother MAHER and others who know the business thoroughly can give, the first form is worked down to practically any size desired. It is only a question of a sufficient amount of proper manipulation. The felt simply becomes thicker and thicker as it is worked until the size desired is reached.

"I promised to tell something of the story of the hat from the time it is a rabbit in Australia until the bow is placed on it in Danbury. The rabbit is caught in Australia. I do not mean by that that all the furs come from Australia, but for the ordinary grades of hats perhaps three-fourths of all the fur that is used comes from Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania. A considerable part of the remainder of it comes from the hare of Saxony, from the coney in England and Scotland, the hare in Belgium, and also some from France. The nutria from the Argentine Republic and the beaver and otter from the northwestern part of this country are used to some extent in the finer grades of hats, such as are made by the Stetson Co., of Philadelphia, whose moving-picture exhibit you will see a little later on. This company uses a number of these kinds of high-grade fur for some of the finer grades of hats.

"Coming back to the rabbit—because he furnishes most of the fur used in the Danbury hatting industry—these rabbits are caught by means of a wire inclosure having a narrow throat and a wide mouth running out a mile or so on either side, opening out in this way [indicating]. Men and boys who are engaged in the chase form a cordon connecting the extremities of the wide opening, and thus surround the territory from which the rabbits are to be caught. A great disturbance is created, the rabbits are frightened, run away from threatened danger, and hasten toward the inclosure. When they once enter the long opening or gateway they soon pass through the narrow throat into the pen itself.

"In this way they are caught by the thousands, hundreds of thousands, and even millions, for that matter, because their skins come here by the millions. The rabbits being caught in this way, they are readily dispatched by means of clubs. When the skin is brought to this country it is in this shape [indicating]. This is one of the skins just as it comes from Australia.

"The first operation is to take out the hair. There is a certain amount of long hair, as you can see, and you can feel it better than you can see it. The first operation is called plucking, I believe. Is that right, Brother MAHER?

"Mr. MAHER. Yes, sir.

"Mr. TILSON. The first operation is to pluck out the hairs and leave only the fur. When the hair is plucked out the skin is like this [indicating]. This is the same kind of a pelt as the first one, only with the hair plucked out. It seems now to be a very fine piece of fur. These furs are undoubtedly made into coats and other wearing apparel made of fur that the ladies of this country wear. They are not extremely expensive, but have a very soft and smooth feeling to the touch and are really very good furs.

"The next operation is what is called carroting. On each one of these separate particles of fur there are little follicles of natural oil from the animal. They contain dust and other foreign substances which the animal collects during his life, and these dull the barbs, as it were. If you attempted to use the fur in the natural state, it would not felt. Therefore the process called carroting is necessary, which consists of a treatment of mercury and sulphuric acid. The skins must next be dried. If dried by artificial heat, it is called yellow carroting. If they are allowed to dry naturally, they are not yellow but are nearly white. This is called white carroting. I believe that where the skins are dried by artificial heat the fur is considered better than if they are allowed to dry naturally.

"The next two processes I could not illustrate on the board, because the exhibits are too fragile to hang on a nail. The next process is where the pelt is run through a machine and the pelt is clipped off from the fur, or the fur from the pelt, by means of a machine. Although I have not had an opportunity of seeing the Stetson moving-picture film myself, I think it will explain just how the fur is cut off.

"This [indicating] is the fur from a single rabbit just as it is cut off from the pelt after it is carroted. After the pelts are carroted, however, and before the fur is removed, they are stored away, as a rule; and the longer they are stored, the better. They are like wine, good friends, and some other things—the longer you keep them the better they are, because they improve with age.

"The next operation is preparing the fur for making into the hat. The operation of blowing the fur is a very extensive one and will be shown fully in the moving pictures which are to follow. The fur is blown into a cloud as it goes through the many chambers of the blowing machine, and all the little pieces of pelt, the short pieces of hair, and other impurities drop away from the fur. The fur being lighter, the more solid matter drops to the bottom as a deposit in each chamber while the fur passes from one chamber to another. I think there are eight chambers in one of the blowing machines, and the fur is run through once or twice, as I recall. I think the Stetson Co. runs it through once, and then as it is mixed it is run through again. As I recall now, most of the Danbury people blow it just the one time, and that is when they mix it.

"This [indicating] is the mixed fur ready to make a hat. What I hold in my hand is the amount of fur required to make a hat. The makers determine what the quality of the hat shall be by the kind of fur they put in. They do not put in all of the fur of one kind. Whatever the grade of hat it is desired to make, whatever the price and quality, that is determined at this stage by the material that goes into the hat. After having determined the quality and selected the material, it is then sent through the mixer or blender. When it comes out it is in this shape [indicating], ready to be formed into a hat.

"The most interesting operation of all, or at least the one most interesting to me, is the forming of the hat. The operation that fewest people understand is the one that changes the light, fleecy fur into this shape [indicating], called a body. After being weighed out, as in the last exhibit I showed you, it is ready for the 'former.' It is put upon a traveling belt or apron I think it is called, by which it is carried through rollers, where it is picked up and is finally formed into a cloud. The whole air of the chamber is full of it. When it emerges on the other side over the last plate it enters the large receptacle of the 'former,' which contains a large revolving copper cone. The cone is perforated with fine holes, and under the cone is a fan producing considerable suction. The cone is wet, and as the fur comes through in a cloud, by reason of the great suction below it is drawn to the cone and attempts to pass through the little holes and, being caught upon the damp metal, forms a very thin layer upon the cone. As soon as all the fur has settled upon the cone it is submerged in hot water. It is immediately withdrawn, and the operator skillfully places a piece of cloth around it. At this stage the felt must be handled with great care and skill, because it is exceedingly tender and requires a skilled artist to handle it at all without tearing it to pieces.

"It is then put through another process called hardening. It is rolled up in a cloth and with each successive working it becomes felted a little more and a little more. This [indicating] has reached what hatters call the hardening stage, but it is not very hard and will pull apart if made to hold up its own weight.

"The next operation is to size the hat. Reducing it from this size to the next size [indicating] is called sizing. This is the job that Brother MAHER did when he was in the trade, as he has told you. He took charge of the hat at this size [indicating] and carried it down through this size [indicating] until it reached the next smaller size. This is done by a system of folding and manipulation. The 'sizer' folds it a certain way, then rolls it in a cloth, and then repeats the operation if it is sized by hand. Did you work by hand, Mr. MAHER?

"Mr. MAHER. Yes; I served my apprenticeship at handwork.

"Mr. TILSON. Most of this work in Danbury is now done by machinery, but the Stetson Co., I believe, still does it largely by hand. The operators first roll up—I think it is three or four bodies in a package. How many do they roll together, Mr. MAHER?

"Mr. MAHER. Usually four; but it is according to the weight of the hat.

"Mr. TILSON. As I remember it, four. They first fold it over like this [indicating], then roll it up, and run it through a time or two. Then they take out the four bodies, fold them up in another way, and run them through the mill again. Then they fold them in still another way, and it requires great skill to fold them properly in order to make the bodies all felt evenly. When the pictures are shown you will see something of this operation, but it is impossible for even a moving picture, much less a word picture, to describe just how skillfully this work must be done.

"After carrying it through this process, either by hand or by machinery, the body is brought down to this size [indicating]. As I have indicated, there are two methods of sizing—one entirely by hand and the other aided somewhat by machinery. There is one stage of the process where the work is done by a machine called the multi-roller. It is claimed by those who have this machine and use it that it does superior work in the sizing operation. After all, the principal thing is the motion, the moisture, the warmth, and the skillful manipulation. Do not forget this, because it requires the highest degree of skill to enable a man to do this work and make it come out right.

"If the 'sizer' is not skilled in handling four or five bodies together, the first thing he knows one hat is felted to another, and if he attempts to take them apart after the barbs once engage one another he will tear the hats and they are both ruined. It is, then, a work requiring the highest degree of skill. If a duty on hats ever becomes a living question again—in other words, if production becomes normal again—Members of Congress will find this an important point to bear in mind. The price that must be paid to the workman who can do this kind of skillful work must in some way be equalized with what the other fellow has to pay to the workman in other countries who makes the same kind of hat, because, giving us the same labor and material costs, the world can not beat us. No one can beat us. We can make just as good hats and make them as cheaply as anybody in the world if due allowance is made for the difference we must pay our high-priced, highly skilled workmen. And we are not in favor of giving them any less, because if you could see them do this work you would agree that they earn every penny of what they receive.

"At this point is the parting of the road for the soft hat and the stiff hat. Up to this point [indicating] they are exactly the same. These two exhibits are practically the same. This [indicating] is for a soft hat and this [indicating] is for a stiff hat. The only difference is that the stiff hat has been shaved to make it smooth and the soft hat has not been. There is another slight difference; as a rule, the soft hat is heavier. There is more fur put into the soft hat. Since there is a considerable amount of shellac in the stiff hat it does not need quite so much fur. I should say that as a rule about one-third more material is put into a soft hat than into a stiff hat.

"I shall go through the next processes a little more rapidly. The next process in the making of the soft hat is to color it, and this [indicating] shows the hat after it has been dyed. Where the multi-roller process is used it is colored at the same time it goes through the multi-roller. This exhibit [indicating] is a stiff hat that has had the shellac put into it.

"The next operation is what is called tip stretching. I do not know what the Stetson people call it, but in Danbury they call it the tip stretch. The top of the hat, instead of being shaped like this [indicating], is now drawn out into a crown. The tip stretching is done by a machine. I think the pictures will show the machine at work. It is a machine with finger-like projections working up and down on a stretcher.

"The next operation is to stretch the brim. You see it does not have any brim here [indicating], but another machine stretches the brim and then it begins to assume something like the shape of a hat. The same operation is performed with the stiff hat. Here is the tip stretch [indicating] and here is the brim stretch [indicating].

"We come now to the operation where it takes on the form of a real hat. This is where it is blocked. This is a soft hat blocked [indicating]. A flange determines the shape of the brim with relation to the crown. This is what is called a finished hat. I do not mean that it is complete at all, but it has had a finish put on it. The finishing process is called pouncing, which simply means rubbing it with coarse-grained emery paper. There is a machine that does it on the inside and another on the outside. When it is finally pounced, it is ready for the trimmer. The band is then put on, which is one of the last operations. The sweatband is put in, the bow sewed on and we have the finished hat. I have here the one which I happen to wear, which was made in Danbury, and which shows you the final form.

"The stiff hat requires a slightly different treatment in the final shaping of the brim.

"Very briefly this is the story of the hat. If I were speaking in the House, I should not feel that I had imparted much information if some one did not ask me a question. Therefore I shall be very glad to try to answer, from a layman's point of view, any question that anyone in the audience may wish to ask concerning the making of a hat.

"Mr. SUMMERS. What do they do with the pelts?

"Mr. TILSON. I am glad you asked that question, Mr. SUMMERS. The pelt is cut off in small strips, as it is separated from the fur, and used in making glue or gelatin. It is probably not the gelatin we use on the table but at any rate moving-picture films are made of it. The hair, of course, is made into fertilizer. There is no part of it lost.

"Mr. MAHER. May I ask you a question?

"Mr. TILSON. Yes; I wish you would.

"Mr. MAHER. You have told us about the Knights of St. Clement and the origin of felt, can you tell us how the words 'as mad as a hatter' originated?

"Mr. TILSON. I am sorry I can not tell you. I was in hopes that you with your knowledge of the traditions of the Knights of St. Clement would be able to answer that question for the information of the rest of us.

"Mr. EARLY. You did not tell us how much it was adulterated with wool or anything of that sort.

"Mr. TILSON. The fur is not adulterated with wool at all, and at the present price of wool that probably would not be considered an adulteration. If it is desired to make a cheap grade of hat, it can be made pretty cheap by putting in what is called the belly fur, taken from the flanks and belly of the rabbit, which is a cheaper grade. Sometimes the trimmings from hats, which have been felted once, are turned back into the mixture.

"The trimmings make short fur, which is not the best, but they can be mixed in; and, as I said awhile ago, the quality of the hat is determined by the kind of fur put into it.

"Perhaps some of you have thought that the price of fur hats was pretty high. I know that to be true, but not only the labor but also the material that has gone into the hats, including the fur, has jumped up in price tremendously.

"Mr. EARLY. I did not know but what you could use some other fiber in making hats.

"Mr. TILSON. I do not believe that they do, though I have heard of some very cheap grades of fur.

"Mr. CHINDBLOM. Are beaver hats actually made of beaver fur?

"Mr. TILSON. There is beaver fur in it, but I do not know how much there is in it. When the Stetson exhibit comes on, you will see that this company uses beaver fur to a considerable extent. I do not know that it would be claimed that there is very much beaver fur used in a hat now.

"Mr. CHINDBLOM. Are there any other animals that could be substituted for rabbits, hares, and beavers for this purpose?

"Mr. TILSON. Yes; the otter is sometimes used and the muskrat is sometimes used. The nutria, from Argentina, is also used. The Stetson Co. uses that fur considerably. As I said a while ago, the hare of Saxony, Belgium, and northern France, and the coney of Scotland and England are used.

"Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I was wondering whether it is known by the hat manufacturers that in many of the Western States, and especially in Idaho and Oregon, there are millions of rabbits known as jack rabbits and, if so, why it is that those rabbits are not utilized for this purpose, instead of importing hares from Australia and Saxony.

"Mr. TILSON. I do not believe that they would answer the purpose very well. I think their fur is too short, like that of the common rabbit that we see here in the eastern part of the country. Some of the animals I have mentioned have been brought here from abroad, but when bred in this country the fur soon becomes short and of little value. The climatic conditions are such that the fur that grows on the rabbits living here is not suitable for making hats.

"Mr. GALLAGHER. You have not explained to us the operation of sewing on the bow.

"Mr. TILSON. That is a simple but interesting operation, usually done by a girl on a sewing machine. When I was at Danbury a short time ago I saw a girl, possibly 16 years of age, sewing on hatbands. I asked her how much she received for that work, and she said she received 10 cents per dozen for putting the bands on. I asked her how many she did in a day, and she replied 70 dozen. Therefore she was making $7 per day.

"Mr. MICHENER. Has Connecticut a child-labor law?

"Mr. TILSON. Yes.

"Mr. MICHENER. Is it enforced?

"Mr. TILSON. Yes.

"Mr. SMITH of Idaho. How old did you say this little girl was?

"Mr. TILSON. Fifteen or sixteen years of age. They must go to school in Connecticut until they are 14 years old. She might have been older than 16 years.

"If there are no other questions, I shall ask the representative of the Stetson Co. to show us his moving pictures. The J. B. Stetson Co., of Philadelphia, as you all know, makes a very high grade of hat. You will see from the picture that the company makes hats largely by handwork, whereas most hats are now made by machinery.

"Mr. MICHENER. Is there any duty on the fur that is imported from Argentina and Australia?

"Mr. TILSON. I do not think so. As it is raw material, it would be a very foolish thing for us to impose a duty on it.

"Mr. MAHER. There is no duty on it.

"Mr. TILSON. I should not think there would be a duty on it, because it is a raw material.

"Mr. HARDY of Colorado. If a little girl can make $7 per day at this work, how much do the men make?

"Mr. TILSON. Some of the men make almost as much as carpenters and plumbers now. A man doing piecework who can do it well can make pretty high wages. These men do skillful work, for it takes a high degree of skill to successfully make a hat.

"Mr. MICHENER. How do they trim the hats?

"Mr. TILSON. The stiff hat is put on a machine that is very hot, and under great pressure the brim is turned and curled. There are also machines by means of which the trimming around the edges is sewed on. The band is put on in a very simple way by a girl using a machine.

"Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is there any danger of the rabbits in Australia dying out?

"Mr. TILSON. I have made some inquiry about that, and it seems that they multiply very rapidly in that country. If we should not be able to secure the rabbits, I do not know what we should do for hats.

"Mr. DALLINGER. What is the price of the skin?

"Mr. TILSON. I do not know what the prices are. Mr. Farrell, of the Danbury Co., who is present, might be able to tell us what are the prices of rabbit skins of different kinds and qualities.

"Mr. DALLINGER. What is the price of first-class skins?

"Mr. FARRELL. The rabbit skin about which the gentleman asked information, Australian rabbit skins, cost $2.25 per pound.

"Mr. DALLINGER. The skins?

"Mr. FARRELL. Yes, sir.

"Mr. DALLINGER. How much does the fur cost?

"Mr. FARRELL. As cut from the skin, it would cost $13 or $15 per pound.

"Mr. TILSON. I thought it was about $15 per pound. Anywhere from 1½ ounces to 3 ounces go into a hat. You can see the cost of the material going into a hat from these very high prices for fur. A cowboy hat, weighing a pound, as many of them do, requires sufficient material alone to make the hat quite expensive.

"Mr. SUMNERS. What material was used in the making of hats before they began to use rabbit fur?

"Mr. TILSON. Cloth was used, of course. You will recall the old pictures of kings and nobles of olden times wearing a kind of bonnet.

"Mr. SUMNERS. How long has rabbit fur been used for this purpose?

"Mr. TILSON. I do not know.

"Mr. MAHER. About 400 years. It is one of the oldest industries in the United States.

"Mr. SUMNERS. Where did they get the rabbits from then?

"Mr. TILSON. Probably from Saxony, Belgium, Scotland, or England, since all of these produce a high grade of fur to-day. So far as modern history is concerned, we have always had fur from those countries.

"If there are no further questions, I wish to thank you very much for your kind attention, and will now let the Stetson exhibit go forward."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER J. DOOLING,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. DOOLING. Mr. Speaker, although I shall vote for the bill, I exceedingly regret that there has not been provided a sufficient or adequate salary for the letter carriers, clerks, and some other postal employees in my city. The increase recommended by the commission—a minimum of $1,400 and a maximum of $1,800 to clerks and carriers—is entirely too small to satisfy the necessary demands of these men. By their strict devotion to duty, by their loyalty to service, for the hard and diligent labor they have performed, they have deserved much better treatment at the hands of this Congress.

So greatly underpaid have been the postal men that resignations from the service have been numerous, and we have, as a consequence, lost many of the well-trained and highly skilled men. The Postal Service, which should be kept up to the best and highest standard of efficiency, has been seriously impaired and badly crippled.

The Government has so far pursued toward the postal employees a false economy in withholding from them a fair and decent living wage. As a result of such a course, discontent and demoralization in the service have set in and the business interests of the country have everywhere greatly suffered. The impairment and breakdown of efficiency in the Postal Service are really due to the neglect to give to the people who handle and carry the mail a salary sufficient to enable them to meet the great and constantly growing increase in living expenses.

The business men in no uncertain terms have earnestly appealed to us to raise the postal men's pay as a matter of intelligent business economy and in common fairness and justice to the employees.

Surely these postal employees are deserving of much better treatment, and a better measure of compensation, at least so far as the carriers and clerks in New York and other large cities are concerned, than they are to receive under this bill. I regret we can not amend the bill so that we could vote to the clerks and carriers a higher and better salary than the commission recommends. Under the procedure of suspending the rules we are powerless to get a change, and hence I shall vote for the bill as the best one we can get at this time. The increases granted by the bill will go a little way toward relieving the acute situation of the men and women in the service and aid them to meet their necessitous demands. Yet they deserve much more at the hands of the American Nation, the people of which they serve at all times and in all seasons with commendable fidelity and with a high degree of patriotism unexcelled by any other class of Government employees.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. B. ROUSE,
OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article written for the Chattanooga News relative to the long, faithful, and most efficient record made in the Congress by my friend and colleague, Hon. JOHN A. MOON, of Tennessee.

The article is as follows:

(By John D. Erwin.)

WASHINGTON, April 29.

It may be of interest to the public to know something of the service in Congress of one of the Tennessee Members who has no press bureaus, but who is now serving his twenty-fourth year in the House of Representatives, as demonstrating the wisdom of returning an able and experienced Member rather than to seek a new one, who must necessarily be inexperienced, and educate him for the performance of the important duties of this office. The able, experienced, and influential men in Congress are of the utmost value to their constituents, particularly in these times of social and political unrest, and as we are entering upon a period of reconstruction necessarily following the war with the Imperial German Government.

These men know the conditions as they were and as they are, and are necessarily better fitted to meet the emergency than any new man, however able, could be. A new Member is generally helpless.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON, of the third district of Tennessee, was first elected to Congress in November, 1896, overcoming the Republican majority in the district of 3,500 in 1894, and securing election over all opposition by 1,400 majority. He redeemed the district to the Democratic Party and as its nominee has been elected at each succeeding election with an increased majority. He has served as a member, and the ranking Democratic member, and as chairman for eight years, on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. During his whole service he has remained a member of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee. On account of the importance of this committee, no member of it, under the present rules of the House, can be a member of any other committee. He was also a member of the Committee on the Territories, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and the three postal committees, and on the National Waterways Commission, and as chairman of special committees appointed by the House and has declined some appointments. He has always been strongly assigned on committees.

He is regarded as one of the ablest speakers and debaters in the House. He has rendered much service for his district and State and for the Union at large. He has actively supported the Democratic administration and all of its constructive legislation. He is a fearless Democrat, but serves all the people.

Ex-Speaker CLARK said of him that he was one of the ablest men that had been in the American Congress. Senator UNDERWOOD, when floor leader of the House, said that Judge MOON was the author, perhaps, of more remedial legislation in the interest of the whole people than any other man in public life. On many occasions Members of the House on the floor have complimented him on his ability and public service. Postmaster General Burleson thanked him in a letter, which was published, for his work for the administration, and particularly for his service on the Post Office Committee and the passage of the parcel-post law, railway-mail pay law, and many administration statutes in the interest of economy and good government.

It is said that Congressman MOON never permits a day to pass without answering the mail received that day from his constituents, if it is possible to do so. He gives the closest attention to business intrusted to him by any and all of his constituents. He does not speak very often on the floor of the House; and yet his speeches, always able and logical, often ornate, scholarly, and eloquent, would fill a volume of more than a thousand pages. They would be very interesting and instructive reading for those who desire to know something about public questions and the principles of our Government.

He has done all that is possible to do for the people of the counties of his district. We will not undertake to mention his many official acts in the interest of his district, State, and county, but it would be well to recall a few of them.

DISTRICT.

He was active in the development of the rural mail routes system.

He covered his district with rural free delivery routes and post offices.

He caused to be built post-office buildings in Cleveland and Winchester and secured an appropriation for the improvement of the customhouse building at Chattanooga.

He secured an appropriation to build a post-office building at Athens. The committee on his measures has recommended the construction of a post-office building at McMinnville.

He has presented bills for the construction of post-office buildings at Sparta and other county seats and other towns in the district, which he hopes to pass.

He secured the passage of a brigade-post law and other legislation concerning the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, including the purchase of Point Lookout and a part of the park. The Hooker—Government—road was secured by his bill and the legislation authorizing the construction of electric car lines to this park, a portion of which is in Tennessee.

He secured legislation to protect the storm sufferers in Bradley County.

He secured a large appropriation for the complete navigation of the Hiwassee River to the head of navigation. This work has been completed, and the unused portion of the money returned to the Treasury.

He has passed the legislation for the construction of Hales Bar Lock and Dam in Marion County, Tenn., which was absolutely essential to navigation in the Tennessee River, and by its construction by private individuals the Government was saved $11,000,000 and secured navigation of the river under its control at this stretch of the river.

He advocated abandoning contests by congressional districts for the improvement of the Tennessee River and urged the united action of all the States interested for the improvement of the whole river, beginning below and coming up, and this policy was adopted. From 1872 to the time that Judge MOON entered Congress the appropriations over a period of 70 years were $5,159,798.66. Since he entered Congress his active work in connection with the Tennessee River Association and the Senators and Congressmen of Alabama and Tennessee has brought about an appropriation of $7,703,465.60 more in the last twenty-odd years. This does not include the Muscle Shoals, where about $12,000,000 and more is being spent to build a nitrate plant for war purposes, to open navigation, and to furnish fertilizers cheaply to the farmers.

The Postmaster General is authority for the statement that it was largely the influence of Judge MOON that induced the President to locate this great plant at Muscle Shoals. When this plant is completed and a little more work which will be provided for in the next Congress, it is believed that the Tennessee River will be opened for navigation from Chattanooga to its mouth.

He had passed a measure that increased the depth to which the whole river was to be improved a few years ago. In connection with others he is now seeking to develop, through the engineers, a plan for the development of the river above Chattanooga to Knoxville, which will complete this part of the river for open navigation all the year.

He has had many meritorious pension bills passed and has secured by legislation the payment of many thousands of dollars of old war claims to his constituents. He has aided hundreds of our soldiers and sailors in securing their rights from the Government.

He has had bills passed to authorize the construction of county and railroad bridges over the river.

GENERAL LEGISLATION.

Some general legislation of which he has been the author or the most active advocate and supporter may be mentioned, but, of course, only a small portion of it.

He twice organized against the balance of his committee opposition to the Loud bills, which were intended to practically destroy the country press by unjust restrictions and impositions and succeeded on both occasions.

His motion to strike the special subsidies of railroads from the Post Office bill, which was finally adopted, saved $500,000 per annum to the people. His efforts some years ago with others to decrease the cost of carriage of mails saved some $4,000,000 to the people. He introduced the administration measure which he prepared in part to change the method of paying for the transportation of inland mail from a weight to a space basis. This measure met the opposition of all the great daily papers and of the management of every foot of railroads in the United States. As chairman of the committee having the bill in charge he fought the measure through Congress and it became a law. It was a just and accurate method of payment for this service and a great improvement in the conduct of service and of the management of mails, and will save the Government many millions of dollars.

He has been a strong advocate of Government aid for the improvement of State and county roads. He offered one of the first resolutions, which became a law, for experimental road improvement and made one of the first and clearest arguments in support of the constitutionality of Government aid to roads. He assisted in the passage of various laws on this subject, and as chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, having advocated and agreed to the same in conference, he put through the House the provision that appropriated $200,000,000 to be expended over the period of the next three years as the Government's contribution for good roads improvement in the United States. Work under the law is now being done in many States. Tennessee is provided for under the law.

He has caused to be passed a large number of laws attached as riders to the Post Office and Post Roads bill for the enlargement, improvement, and protection of the postal system and to simplify and economize the same, including the enlargements of the provisions of the Government's postal savings bank law. Among these measures was included the abolition of pneumatic tubes in large cities, by which the Government was saved much money. It was on Judge MOON'S initiative, when he was a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, that the rivers of the South received the first adequate appropriation that they had had since the Civil War. He was one of a subcommittee of two, the chairman and himself, who fixed these appropriations, and they multiplied the same over the engineers' estimates, in some instances, as much as two or three times, and Congress accepted the same. This was the largest rivers and harbors bill ever passed.

Perhaps one of the most important things that he has done was to introduce and cause to be passed the parcel-post law. This bill was amended slightly in the Senate and in conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. Senator Bourne, chairman of the Senate committee, and Judge MOON, chairman of the House committee, united the House and Senate provisions, which were approved in the conference and by Congress and is the present law. This law has proven a great blessing to the people and has given them a very cheap method of transporting articles through the mails. It is producing a clear profit of between $10,000,000 and $12,000,000 per annum to the Government, which will continue to increase. No greater public service has been performed than the passage of this measure for the whole people.

Under the Democratic administration and partly as the result of the parcel-post and other laws introduced by Judge MOON, the surplus revenue, after paying all expenses of the Postal System, was $32,486,027.04, as against a deficit of $73,667,296.74 in a similar period in the two preceding Republican administrations. This was the first surplus in the history of the department.

As a member of the Committee on Territories he helped to frame the organic law of Hawaii and helped frame the legislation for the other Territories. It was by his efforts in the conference committee in the closing days of one Congress that the conference failed to act upon the bill that proposed to unite the great Territories of Arizona and New Mexico in one State. This enabled the creation of two great States subsequently.

He has favored 14 or 15 laws in the interest of labor and opposed those against the interest of labor. He supported the measures for the benefit of agriculture and the farmers' interest and commercial and mining interests, not because of any of these classes as such but because all of this legislation was just and democratic and essential to the welfare of the whole people.

He favored the war against Germany on account of her atrocious conduct in murdering our people, sinking our ships, and destroying our commerce on the high seas. He has voted for the measures in the support of this war. He preferred the volunteer system of raising an army to the draft system, but in order that there might be absolute unity and no division shown in Congress he voted on the final vote on the conference report for the draft act. He opposed sending boys under 21 years of age to the war until it became a necessity of the last call. He has favored liberal pensions and compensation to the soldiers of the war with Germany and all other wars. He still favors adequate pensions to all soldiers and sailors disabled or whose health was impaired in the war, and liberal treatment toward all needy soldiers who were enlisted, and hopes that something may be done for all the men who were in the Army in the war against Germany, by some proper plan for their compensation, but feels that it would be a discredit to the soldiers and to the country to adopt any method that would in its effect commercialize the patriotism and valor of our soldiers. By the way, he is one of about 15 or 20 men, some now living and some dead, who have voted for a declaration of war three times by the United States against foreign countries. He voted for the War with Spain, with Germany, and with Austria-Hungary.

He has urged economy in the administration and a reduction in the offices and salaries of high-paid officials and some increase in the salaries of lower-paid officials.

He favors the reduction of the war debt over a space of 50 or 60 years, if necessary; the repeal of all war statutes, the repeal of all unwise restrictions on business and commerce to the end that normal times may speedily return with the lowering of the price or the cost of living and to enable the people to easily and readily pay the tax essential to meet the war debt and interest.

He has been the author of many other measures in Congress and has aided in the passage or rejection of many more. He has much important work laid out for his district and of a general character, which he hopes to accomplish later on.

He is one of the most popular men in the House, which adds to his value as a legislator. He aids everyone he can and never claims full credit for anything, saying that no man can do anything alone.

It is safe to say that but few, if any, districts in the United States can show a better record for their Congressman, either on the floor of the House or in committee and departmental work, than the third congressional district of Tennessee. The facts as to his part in legislation on the floor of the House are all shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Postal Employees' Salaries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, we have about reached the completion of the debate on this rule. No man on the floor of the House has any doubt about the passage of this bill, which has for its purpose the increase of the salaries of the men and women in the Postal Service of the United States Government. I intend to vote for it, not for the reason that it grants the compensation to which these people are justly entitled, but because the majority party in control of legislation will give us no opportunity to amend the bill and raise the amount for each class of employees to what it should be. In other words, we must take this bill or nothing. We are told that these recommendations are the result of the investigation of the Postal Commission appointed over one year ago to examine thoroughly all the details connected with the service. They visited many of the larger cities of the country, and heard the testimony of hundreds of witnesses in the various postal departments. Now we have this report, obtained after all this work and at probably great expense. What is the result? A recommendation that denies the men a wage that would give them even the necessaries of life, much less any of the luxuries that should be theirs after years of honest and faithful service in this most important branch of the Government.

They look for just recognition at this time and we deny it to them. Is it fair? Is it right? Does it offer any inducement to young men to come into the post-office work and replace a force that is rapidly being depleted by the march of age and the more potent reason of resignation, the securing of better wages, better hours, better opportunities in other walks of life?

If we are to maintain the previous high standard and efficiency of this service we must provide adequate compensation for the workers, at least a living wage in accordance with American standards.

In casting my vote for this bill now before us I do so only with the hope and expectation that the next House of Representatives or the present Senate will bring in legislation that will advance the salaries to a figure sufficient to compensate a class of as loyal, honest, and splendid workers as ever served any nation.

Investigation of the Escape of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JULIUS KAHN,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago a notorious slacker and draft deserter by the name of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll escaped from two sergeants of the United States Army under rather peculiar and extraordinary circumstances.

Bergdoll is a millionaire; his mother is likewise worth millions of dollars. He evaded the draft, although of draft age, and refused to perform his duty as an American citizen.

Doubtless the great wealth which his people had amassed in this country was due to the benefits, advantages, and opportunities that the humblest citizen finds under the Stars and Stripes.

After the signing of the armistice, he was apprehended as a draft deserter, was tried by court-martial at the military headquarters on Governors Island, N. Y., and was sentenced to five years at hard labor in Fort Jay, on said Governors Island, N. Y.

While serving his sentence some one concocted a seemingly absurd story about his having cached $150,000 in gold somewhere in the hills of Maryland near Hagerstown. Upon such a specious and absurd plea he was granted permission to leave his place of confinement, go to Philadelphia under the guard of the two sergeants aforesaid, and was taken to his mother's home under the plea that the automobile, which was to have taken him to the cache where the gold was hidden, had met with an accident and had to be repaired. I understand that the permit which was granted him by the War Department officials expressly provided that he would have to be taken to the hidden treasure and returned immediately to his place of confinement. Whoever exerted the pull to allow him to be taken to his mother's home nobody knows.

The country has been hearing a great deal from the loud-mouthed Bolshevist orators that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor in this Republic. The Bergdoll case will be cited as an instance to prove the truth of that statement.

Deeming it important that the matter should be sifted to the bottom, I introduced the following resolution in the House of Representatives on May 28, 1920:

House resolution 574.

Whereas one Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, recently convicted by Army general court-martial, as a draft deserter and sentenced to confinement for five years in the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Jay, N. Y., has escaped from confinement; and

Whereas charges are made, and there is reason to believe, that a plot and conspiracy existed among and between divers and sundry persons unknown to consummate the escape of the said Bergdoll from confinement under his said sentence: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a select committee of five members of the House be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate and procure all facts relevant to fixing responsibility for said escape and for the failure to recapture the said Bergdoll, and particularly to determine whether relatives, friends, counsel, or attorneys of the said Bergdoll participated in a plot or conspiracy to effect or give aid to said escape or to prevent recapture; or whether officers, noncommissioned officers, or privates of the Army or other persons connected with the Army or with the administration of the said disciplinary barracks participated in a plot or conspiracy to effect or give aid to said escape or to prevent recapture or were derelict in the performance of any duty devolved or devolving upon them which contributed to making said escape possible or prevented or hindered recapture or made it more easy for the said Bergdoll to elude recapture.

That the committee so appointed may conduct such investigation by subcommittee or otherwise; that said committee or subcommittee may select its own chairman, may hold sessions during the recess of the House, may employ whatever assistance, either clerical or legal, it may deem necessary to aid in conducting said investigation, may administer oaths, may summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers and documents, may employ a stenographer or stenographers to report the same, and have the reports of said hearings printed for use.

That any and all expenses in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

That said committee shall report its findings to the House at the earliest possible date, together with such recommendations as it shall deem pertinent and advisable.

Upon a hearing before the Committee on Rules, that committee ordered a favorable report on the resolution. The Committee on Rules, under the rules of the House, has jurisdiction over questions of investigation. The report of the committee was unanimous in favor of the resolution. Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, chairman of that committee, on the afternoon of June 4, 1920, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, on page 8587, called up the resolution and asked unanimous consent for its present consideration. I regret to say that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] objected to that request. Thereupon the chairman of the Committee on Rules submitted a privileged report from the Committee on Rules and recommended that House resolution 574 be adopted. Thereupon the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made the point of order that there was no quorum present, and the House accordingly had to take a recess. After the recess, when the presence of a quorum had been established, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas again called up the resolution, but the gentleman from Texas again blocked its consideration.

It is to be regretted that this resolution was not permitted by the action of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to be considered. The people of the United States are deeply interested in finding out whether there was a conspiracy to secure the release of the notorious millionaire draft evader, Grover Cleveland Bergdoll. The people of the country are entitled to know who was responsible for the escape of this millionaire draft evader. The people of this country are entitled to know whether there is any foundation for the charge frequently made by those who attempt to overthrow our form of government that there is no justice for the poor man in the United States of America.

The people are entitled to know whether in this country of ours there is one law for the rich and another law for the poor. All of these matters, in my opinion, could have been solved by a strict congressional investigation. The people have a right to know the truth upon the subject.

Personally I know nothing about the details except what has appeared in the daily newspapers.

I understand that the Secretary of War favored the passage of the resolution. I dare say he felt that a thorough investigation ought to be had in order to determine all the facts and place the responsibility where it belongs.

It is to be regretted that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was unwilling to allow this investigation to be made, although he had an absolute right to object to the consideration of the resolution upon his own responsibility as a Member of the House of Representatives.

ESCAPE OF GROVER CLEVELAND BERGDOLL.

"Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution that I send to the Clerk's desk.

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which he sends to the Clerk's desk. The Clerk will report it.

"The Clerk read as follows:

"House resolution 574.

"Whereas one Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, recently convicted by Army general court-martial as a draft deserter and sentenced to confinement for five years in the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Jay, N. Y., has escaped from confinement; and——

"Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, I object to the unanimous-consent request.

"Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

"Mr. GARD. The gentleman can not object until the reading is finished.

"Mr. BLANTON. Objection to unanimous consent is in order at any time.

"The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

"Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

"The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, submits the following report:

"The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 574, submits a privileged report on said resolution, with the recommendation that it be adopted:

"House resolution 574.

"Whereas one Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, recently convicted by Army general court-martial as a draft deserter and sentenced to confinement for five years in the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Jay, N. Y., has escaped from confinement; and

"Whereas charges are made, and there is reason to believe, that a plot and conspiracy existed among and between divers and sundry persons unknown to consummate the escape of the said Bergdoll from confinement under his said sentence: Therefore be it——

"Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] It is clear that there is no quorum present.

"Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

* * * * * * *

"The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventy Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

"Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

"The motion was agreed to.

"The doors were opened.

"Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, just before the recess I submitted a resolution to investigate the escape from a military prison of one Bergdoll. The circumstances surrounding the escape point to a very nasty scandal.

"Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

"Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There being objection, Mr. Speaker, to the consideration of the resolution, I withdraw the resolution.

"Mr. SABATH. And the gentleman should withdraw the statement.

"Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I shall not withdraw the statement.

"Mr. SABATH. It was not in order.

"Mr. BLANTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

"Mr. BLANTON. Should not the House at least expect from the chairman of the Committee on Rules, who virtually makes the rules of the House, that he himself should comply with those rules and not proceed out of order?

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas should comply with the rules of the House."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEMUEL P. PADGETT,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the permission granted to me by the House I avail myself of the privilege of printing in the RECORD the address of the Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, to the graduating class of midshipmen at Annapolis, Md., June 3, 1920. I believe it is worthy of preservation and consideration by the people of the country.

The address is as follows:

"Mr. Superintendent and members of graduating class, it is my official duty and personal privilege to deliver to you, with the imprimatur of your country's confidence, commissions in the Navy of the United States. I use the word 'deliver' rather than the customary word 'present' advisedly. This commission as ensign is yours by right of mastery of a difficult course and the completion of four years of intense study and drill. The delivery of this commission closes a portion of the contract entered into between you and your country the day you entered the Naval Academy. There must be two high contracting parties to every contract. When you proved by examination that you had the qualifications to enter as a midshipman you promised on your part to be diligent in the discharge of your tasks and loyal to your officers and instructors. Authorized thereto by law, the naval authorities entered into contract with each of you that if you lived up to your pledges they would admit you as an officer into a service honored by valor and high tradition. On your part, you have fulfilled your contractual obligations. It becomes my pleasure to be the instrument through which the President of the United States, your Commander in Chief, fulfills the obligations of the Government.

"I wish to emphasize the truth that you are not being presented with a commission. Yours is a title to naval honor and opportunity won in a long and toilsome race, calling for brains and endurance and character—the trinity of worthy achievement. As a matter of fact, young gentlemen, nothing really worth having can be given to you. Nobody can hand you over as a present the qualities and acquirements which make for high usefulness and honorable service. Your father and mother can give you cleanness of body and wise bringing up. Your teachers can give you direction in the attainment of knowledge. Your officers by precept and example can instruct you in the beginnings of the profession you have chosen. You may inherit money; you may be born into surroundings of what the world calls culture; parents and teachers may yearn ever so much to lift you into high position or into fame. But, in truth, after they have handed you over crutches and cane and perhaps automobiles, too, or aircraft, to aid your walking and riding and flying, you must discard them utterly as housebuilders discard the scaffolding when its purpose is finished, for you must stand in the crucial hour at last in your own shoes, stripped for the bout of life.

"Then nothing but your clear head, your mastery of self and science, your clean body, your steadfast courage, and your indomitable will to win can avail you aught in the world's board of selection, where the doctrine of the survival of the fittest is immutable and unchangeable. It is ever true—and ever will be true—that every man is master of his own fate, architect of his own fortune, creator of his own fame. In the final analysis, while every good and helpful influence and the hand of God have all helped to shape our lives, 'rough hew them how we will,' the man on the bridge in the hour when his country's destiny may rest upon his instant and immediate decision has no earthly reliance outside himself. He is of the few among mortals, when war's alarms sound, who has the supreme and sole opportunity to show the stuff of which he is made.

"It is a matter for gratulation that you come into the Navy in a day when it holds—and holds deservedly—higher place in the confidence of the American people than in any period of its history. The United States Navy in the sixties, by courage unsurpassed in combat with brothers of equal valor, bottled up the southern ports and made possible the blockade, the importance of which was not then and has not since been recognized by the historians of that struggle. Immediately after Lee's surrender the country lost sight of its obligation to the Navy, began rapid reduction of appropriations, quit naval construction, and in the early eighties actually refused commissions to graduates of the Naval Academy, inflicting a loss of 750 officers whose service in the World War would have been of great value. It was not until the days of Chandler and Whitney that there came again appreciation of sea power, and it was not until February 3, 1915, when President Wilson declared our Navy 'ought, in my judgment, to be incomparably the most adequate navy in the world,' that we undertook a continuous and systematic and constructive program of building and enlistment and training which alone made possible America's large naval contribution in the World War.

"We have escaped the naval retrogression after the World War which fell upon the country after Appomattox, for, instead of stopping the building of new craft as was then the naval policy of our Republic, we are now building 18 capital ships, which, with the scout cruisers and smaller and newer designs of craft needed to round out the fleet, will give the United States the Navy which Dewey said we should have by 1925 and which President Wilson envisioned in his St. Louis speech. Nor have we now as prior to 1913 been blind to the duty of training naval officers.

"Our main dependence for officers of the Navy to keep pace with changing conditions and to lead in naval development must always be upon this Naval Academy, the very heart and nerve center of our naval thought and progress. In 1913 we increased the number of midshipmen named by each Congressman from 1 to 2; in 1914 from 2 to 3; in 1915 from 3 to 4; and in 1917 from 4 to 5, making possible the admission of 3,136 in September, 1920, as against a possible 585 in 1913 before the act of July 9, 1913, became a law. But the spirit of dependence and confidence of the country in training naval officers is shown in the fact that the law of December 20, 1917, remains unchanged now that war is over, so we go on training here as many regular officers as when we were in the height of the World War.

"There must be no pause in providing opportunities at this academy. Since 1914 the capacity for the housing and instruction of midshipmen has increased from 1,200 to 2,400, not counting facilities for the post-graduate school, and $6,000,000 have been spent for new construction in these epoch-making years, with the result of securing added dignity and impressiveness of its buildings as well as increased facilities. I have a vision of this institution which I expect to live to see translated into accomplishment. The grounds are inadequate for an institution of its character and importance. All the high lands on the opposite side of the Severn, overlooking the academy grounds, should be purchased and made a part of the institution's campus, lawns, ranges, drill grounds, athletic and aviation fields. This proposed addition to the grounds should be connected by a beautiful memorial bridge commemorative of the valor of the 600,000 men who served in the Navy in 1917–18. The chapel, built after the Spanish-American War, can accommodate only a portion of the larger student body in the religious services statedly held here. Moreover, it is ill-suited for the purpose. It would make a noble memorial, not only as the sepulchre of our greatest sailor, John Paul Jones, but for other illustrious naval heroes whose fame gives inspiration to youths ambitious to follow their example. Only this week a memorial window to Farragut was unveiled. A like honor to Dewey will be another incentive to heroism, as well as another fitting recognition of the sailor-statesman whose victory at Manila will forever thrill Americans.

"We are not only training officers here, but there has not been any recession in the authorization of naval personnel or in provision for an adequate naval reserve, and increased opportunities for the education and promotion to commissions is a cardinal and permanent policy of the Navy.

"No military or other institution is American in spirit unless there is the open door of opportunity, encouragement, and welcome to youths who enter as apprentices or seamen. They and the Naval Academy graduates are entitled to the American assurance that demonstrated ability will enable them to mount to the highest rungs of the ladder of promotion, where the four stars of an admiral are awarded only to those who win them by the display of the highest qualities of ability to command. The enlargement and expansion of the post-graduate school here and the War College at Newport evidence growth instead of reduction, as was feared might be ordered with the return of peace. More than that, we are conducting experiments in new naval methods and instruments and in the perfection of old ones, and building a model and modern laboratory for research and development and construction. The late war taught us with new emphasis that new implements of war, new strategy, new tactics, and the quick adaptation of what experience has demonstrated is the key to naval efficiency in the days that lie before you. It did not need the stress of war to make us understand that the naval profession is one of continued study, and that adherence to ancient methods and old strategy is fatal. It was my honor to voice this naval appreciation of the doctrine 'forward, forward let us range' in an address to officers of high rank at the Naval War College at Newport on the 26th day of June, 1915. What I said then, long before we entered the war, to admirals and captains and commanders, was the fixed policy of the Navy before, during, and since the World War, as its glorious record, approved at home and abroad, abundantly attests. The counsel given to high ranking officers in 1915 applies with equal force to the youngest ensign to-day:

"It is with a very solemn feeling that I stand here. Upon my shoulders falls the duty of seeing that the great machinery of the Navy moves smoothly and moves ever forward. It is no light responsibility when you remember that in the supreme moment of our hour of trial, should dark days ever come, upon you must largely rest the success or failure of the use of that machinery in time of war, and to-day that responsibility is far heavier than it has ever been before in history. As you look abroad, you see the foundation of old theories crumbling every day. Old tactics, old strategies, old theories of naval warfare which have stood unchallenged as almost axiomatic since the triremes of Carthage and Rome grappled together in the Mediterranean are disappearing over night. New and terrible instruments of destruction for the first time have appeared under and over the seas. Slipping unseen through the dark waters underneath, silent submarines elude great fleets, slip by impregnable fortifications, thread safely narrow straits sown thickly with mines, and in a moment transform great battleships into useless sunken iron and steel. In the air overhead dirigibles and aeroplanes threaten new danger, add new problems, and upset old theories of warfare. If war upon the land has reverted to the bayonet and the hand grenade, war upon the sea has leaped forward at a single stride and broken almost every shackle of ancient convention.

"We have seen the main fleet of the greatest sea nation in the world withdrawn from the seas to some secluded harbor without having fired a shot during the first year of a mighty conflict. We have seen battles begun at ranges believed to be impossible and ships disabled by shots from guns as yet invisible. We have been told that modern sea fights would be determined in the first 10 minutes, yet we have seen that it took six hours to decide one of the greatest ocean battles of the present war. We have seen ships of shallow draft used as fortresses to protect land armies on the Belgian coast. We read only yesterday of submarines gliding unchallenged past the impregnable fortress of Gibraltar and the guardian ships that watch the straits. We have seen fast cruisers raiding the coast and eluding their pursuers by the help of dirigibles, hovering far above, that watch from their high post as an eagle watches the sea beneath for many miles around to warn through the new miracle, wireless telegraphy, the ships beneath.

"Every day some new thing in naval warfare arises. The old things are passing away; new things must be devised. With what weapons, by what strategy, shall we meet the terror of the submarine; the still unrevealed possibilities of the airship? It is to you, gentlemen, that this question must be put. It is to you your Secretary of the Navy looks for an answer. My earnest word, my solemn plea to-day is to urge you fearlessly to discard worship of all things that are old and to adopt courageously anything that is new the moment that some new development of the present convinces you that the old way is no longer the right way or that the new way points the path of victory. It is the courage of the American people in facing new conditions from the time our forefathers dared and mastered the terrors of the wilderness and built therein a new nation with a new government that has made us great to-day. Holding wisely to what is good in the past, to such principles as stand the acid test of this great war, do not fear to cast aside what have proved to be mere shackles of convention and daringly to go forward.

"I hereby pledge myself to spare no effort to assist this onward march. Rest assured that what you plan will find a sympathetic and attentive ear. I want to feel that when my term of office closes my successor will find, in orderly arrangement, the most perfect plans and methods human wisdom can invent, kept always up to date, for the conduct of our Navy in time of war, and it is here that the studies necessary for such plans must be carried on.

"In this insistence upon emancipation from old things because they are old, and of sailing through the same well-marked channels, you must not understand that there is any lack of reverence for old things or lack of sincere appreciation of the vital benefits of experience.

"It was because the genius of America has the particular quality of imagination, which sees large tasks and the spirit of venturing all, that it was given to the American Navy to conceive and take the laboring oar in carrying out the greatest outstanding new naval contribution of the World War.

"I refer, of course, to laying the 240-mile mine barrage across the North Sea of an average width of 25 miles, or over 6,000 square miles, in the construction of which our Navy laid 56,611 mines, expended $79,476,534.31, and furnished 80 ships and 7,000 officers and men in preparing, laying, and sweeping the mines.

"That epoch-making and stupendous work, which largely closed the Atlantic to the German submarines, was the concrete answer of our Bureau of Ordnance to President Wilson's 'bold and audacious' policy, proposed in April, 1917, a few days after Congress declared war. That new and wonderful barrage, not even dreamed of in any previous war, was characteristic of America's habit of great enterprise, as evidenced in digging the Panama Canal, constructing great dams for irrigation, girdling the globe with wireless, building transcontinental railways, tunneling under river and mountain, revolutionizing warfare by the invention of the submarine, the introduction of electrical propulsion as a new power for capital ships, and regarding obstacles as opportunities for translating dreams into realities. Eight and a half per cent of the submarines destroyed met their fate through the inescapable maw of this barrage constructed by the American and British Navies, but its actual taking of toll, begun in the first month after mine laying, was not its only proof that its construction was worth more than it cost. As long as submarines could safely escape into the boundless ocean, German naval morale was high, and the sporting chance of escaping the limited number of destroyers did not deter officers and men. But when the automatic barrage from Norway to England, remorseless and capacious, made attempted passage the portal to almost certain destruction, when that giant American-conceived barrier of high explosives barred the egress of the U-boats, that specter of death shattered German naval morale and made impotent the submarine menace.

"The world can never forget its debt to naval efficiency which transported and safeguarded without loss of a single life the 2,000,000 American soldiers who gave such preponderance of fighting strength to the Allies as to insure victory. In close cooperation with allied navies, with whom it was our proud privilege to cooperate in friendly comradeship, it was our proud privilege to carry to larger success the ancient and efficient convoy system proposed by the general board before we entered the war, to develop and perfect the use of the new and effective depth bombs and detection devices and improvements in aircraft, and in the discovery and utilization of other agencies which marked naval initiative and progress.

"I congratulate the 289 men of this class that you come into the Navy rich with glorious traditions just after, in the world's greatest war, our Navy has added permanently to its high prestige. From the moment you became a plebe the two words and principles you have heard most, except, of course, 'character' and 'truth,' which are the mudsills upon which all else rests, have been 'tradition' and 'loyalty.' These are golden principles and shine here in the academy and in the naval service incarnate in the lives not only of those who have met their Captain face to face but also of those with whom you are shortly to be shipmates. Here you have been taught naval history and naval tradition of your own country as well as of other nations. Let us love our America best of all, believe in it with all our souls and minds and hearts, and reverence its traditions; but let us not forget that noble virtues and high traditions of other nations also have an uplifting value for us, as well as a broadening and liberalizing influence.

"The comradeship of men of our Navy with those of our allies in the World War gave each an intimate knowledge and high appreciation of the other and cemented national friendships. Men of other callings may be excused for being provincial, but those who sail the Seven Seas must have a world vision, and officers of our Navy must carry to other nations our ideals and bring back to us the best of theirs.

"As you graduate and come into the larger school, what do naval traditions mean to you and how much do they make up of the very warp and woof of your life? Upon the answer to that question much will depend upon how you shape your career. After all, it is the unconscious impartation of something greater than is contained in books that you derive from your instructors. The events of naval history are not so ingrained as the marrow of naval tradition. You must stand an examination in history and you will be approved if you win a mark of 2.5. But there is no measurement of the absorption of the traditions which you have imbibed not only from books and from association but from the very walks and statues and portraits and buildings so dear and so familiar to you. On that walk, where you have been accustomed to tread, Farragut learned the lessons and received the impulse from traditions before his day which gave him high place in the naval hall of fame. Later came Dewey, a youth like each of you, who left Annapolis, uplifted by the traditions left by Farragut, to join him in his victory where the word 'damn,' as used by Farragut, was an expression of valor and not of profanity.

"Naval traditions—what are they and how are they reincarnated? I sometimes fear we are in danger of failing to understand that they are spiritual, not to be followed as if of a certain pattern or garment, but to lift us up to a plane where we see the spirit of the act rather than the deed. To some men tradition is a taskmaster, a hard rule, a beaten path, a weight to hold them to the thing that has been done, and to do it in the same old way. To others tradition is a star in the firmament, a light to the pathway, wings on which to mount as eagles, or rather an airship to sail above the clouds for clearer vision and wiser action, a glorified opportunity to win the goal, not by any precedent or rule or rote, but by an illumination that is spirit and not deed. Of tradition it may be truly said: 'The letter killeth; the spirit maketh alive.' Let me illustrate: Two of our most illustrious heroes were Lawrence and Perry—equal in those splendid qualities which make their careers an inspiration to every man in the Navy. The first won glory in defeat, the second won glory in victory. Both are bright stars in our sky. 'Don't give up the ship' was the dauntless message of Lawrence, and that message fired the imagination of Perry and was emblazoned upon his banners as he fought his famous battle. Lawrence was his hero, but it was not the act or the famous sentence of Lawrence that dominated the very soul of Perry on Lake Erie. It was the stimulating courage of Perry, inspired by the Lawrence tradition, which rose superior to life or death or victory or defeat. Kipling might have well had in mind Lawrence and Perry when he wrote:

"If you can meet with triumph and disaster
And treat those two imposters just the same.

"For in very truth both incarnated that immortal principle.

"Perry's discipleship was of soul, not of matter; of achievement, not of method. He gave up his ship, thus literally disobeying the specific admonition of Lawrence, and, in the face of what seemed certain death, transferred his flag to another ship, and in his victory gave the world a new epigram, 'We have met the enemy and they are ours,' which ranks with the dying declaration of his hero. We do not honor Perry because he succeeded, but because he understood the meaning of the Lawrence tradition of willingness to sacrifice life for country.

"In a very real sense every brave man and every great man makes his own traditions. No man lives in history who was devoted to the conventional, to the accepted theory, the approved practice. In civil life success depends upon the courage to defy what is and to stand for the what ought to be. The path of advancement is strewn with corpses of men who slavishly followed in the footsteps of those they believed they were making their models, forgetting that their exemplar succeeded because he dared to chart new seas and accept the spirit of tradition rather than be its servant by slavish adherence to precedent. In warfare no naval or Army hero can be an imitator. He must be a student of the ways and plans of victorious fighters, but unless he receives the inspiration of their spirit and the readiness to accept new and even radical methods, the knowledge of their plans will be a stumbling block instead of an aeroplane.

"No two wars were ever won by the same tactics and few by the same weapons. The military leader of the future may navigate his ships by radio and the day may even come when all his fighting craft may be 'airy navies battling in the central blue.' My word to the graduates to-day, as they face the future, is that the lessons and inspiration of past traditions are not to be found in the laying of the barrage, in the use of poison gas, in the ships under the sea, or on the sea, or over the sea. If there is a next war—which God forbid, but let us keep our powder dry while we trust in Him—the naval hero will be the man quickest to discover and chart new and successful channels to victory, ready to throw in the discard the best weapon of the World War and adopt instantly the most approved tactics and weapons which will meet the needs of the battle he must win. Naval leaders must always be dominated by the thought that new methods must meet new conditions just as King John said of courage: 'For courage mounteth with occasion.'

"I do not know any more hopeless officer than one chained to the theories and practices of the past, losing the light and leading of Mahan's vision while stumbling and groping in the débris of Mahan's processes. I vividly recall some years ago such a man, studious and burdened with information which he could neither assess nor use, to whom I turned in my enthusiasm for encouragement regarding a new project suggested by able experts for certain improvement in our Navy. He listened to me with a far-away look and a mind closed to new and revolutionary things, gave an adverse opinion, and when pressed for a reason for his opposition said with judicial finality, 'Nothing like that was ever done in the Navy,' and thought nothing else needed to be said to make his answer conclusive. Of course it had never been done before. Nobody ever built an iron ship until the Monitor and Merrimac's battle scrapped all wooden ships. Nobody ever talked to a ship by wireless telephone until faith and science made it possible. Nobody ever sent wireless messages around the globe until men of genius discovered the long-undreamed-of secret. Nobody ever thought a barrage of mines could shut the North Sea until the United States Bureau of Ordnance actually did it in Washington in naval brains and secured the cooperation of the British Admiralty, which made it the wonder of the war.

"Young gentlemen, great leaders are not those who are baffled by mysteries, but those who delve into the secrets of nature and make them the servants of man. Never be carried away by fantastic theories, but never despise the suggestion of so-called cranks. The crank of to-day with a great idea is the inventor of to-morrow and the genius of all the to-morrows. My admonition to you is never to call any proposal of earnest and able men impracticable or unfeasible, for, as a matter of history, every step from sails to wings was first discarded by practical leaders who lacked eyes to see and ears to hear. Remember in your profession—

"There are firths beyond Pentland
And firths beyond Forth.

"There is always a better way of doing anything that man has done, and he only is worthy of leadership who is studying and working to find that better way while others are content to be followers or to use the instruments others have devised.

"The most notable naval speech of this generation, by the President of the United States, your Commander in Chief and mine, was to the officers of the Atlantic Fleet in the summer of 1917, when all the allied navies were in the throes of war. We were 'casting about for a way in which to use our superiority and strength,' but there was doubt and delay among naval statesmen about accepting the solution proposed by the Bureau of Ordnance and other new plans that revolutionized naval warfare. The President, who led in vision and practical strategy, used words fitting to be addressed to ensigns to-day and all days, when he said:

"I do not care where it—the method of crushing the submarine warfare—comes from. I do not care whether it comes from the youngest officer or the oldest, but I want the officers of this Navy to have the distinction of saying how this war is going to be won.

"And so far as the outstanding naval offensive for ending the submarine menace is concerned, that honor was won by the American Navy's original and great conception. Let that be a tradition to incite you to newer heights than have ever been attained.

"The President added in his address at Yorktown: 'I want the youngest and most modest youngster in the service to tell us what to do if he knows what it is.' That is the call to you to-day and to-morrow. Evidently our Commander in Chief feared that the conception of tradition I have been warning you against might militate against the world need of radical methods; for he gave this admonition: 'We have got to throw tradition to the winds. I should like to see something unusual happen, something that was never done before,' adding emphatically: 'There is no other way to win; the whole principle of this war is the kind of thing that ought to hearten and stimulate America.'

"America has always boasted that she could find men to do anything, and it was not an idle boast, as the safe transportation and convoy of 2,000,000 troops across the infested danger zone and their courage on every battle field, the North Sea barrage, and fighting on sea and land attested.

"The dauntless spirit of John Paul Jones, of Farragut, of Dewey flashed in the eyes of the President as he gave this challenge to courage:

"I have several times ventured to make this suggestion to men about me in both arms of the service: Please leave out of your vocabulary altogether the word 'prudent.' Do not stop to think of what is prudent for a moment. Do the thing that is audacious to the utmost point of risk and daring, because that is exactly the thing that the other side does not understand, and you will win by the audacity of method when you can not win by circumspection and prudence. I think there are willing ears to hear this in the American Navy and the American Army, for that is the kind of folks we are. We get tired of the old ways and covet the new ones. Let us do something we were never taught to do and do it just as well as we are doing the older and more habitual things.

"The President closed his wonderful address by declaring his belief that the American Army and Navy would 'do new and audacious and successful things,' which was at once an inspiration and a prophecy.

"The American tradition of boldness and audacity and coveting new ways, enforced by World War achievement, will save you from the danger of a slavish adherence to tradition or precedent in method, while heartening you with the girding realization that the tradition of daring and audacity is bounded by no limits or possibilities or miracles.

"Loyalty is close akin to tradition—indeed, inseparable. All our best naval traditions are based upon loyalty to constituted authority. Like the word 'love,' it baffles definition. When love keeps books and has a debit and credit side to the ledger, it is no longer the light of life but a ball and chain. So it is of loyalty. It is an essence, a spirit, a soul, the whole life. Loyalty and love give gladly, fully, freely, completely, finding compensation in pouring out all for the person or the cause. We bring loyalty down from its pinnacle when we seek to make it a system and prescribe for it rigid rules and regulations. The day a man in the Navy begins to measure and weigh whether this act or that expression squares with loyalty, that moment he is disloyal to his country, to his associates, to his leader.

"Loyalty is not a service to be performed. It is a principle that governs action. When your country is assailed you do not need some one to direct you to offer your life in its defense. Your only need is that your superior officer shall assign your battle station. In peace your loyalty is innate and spontaneous as it bourgeons into patriotic service and fidelity to country and to chosen leader. No military organization can exist with efficiency without the highest loyalty of the men of high and low rank. Loyalty requires immediate, unquestioning obedience to authority.

"Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.

"But loyalty and obedience in our generation imposes no restraint upon independent judgment or upon proper initiative. The day will never come when in the rush of battle or in military service there can be debate or hesitation as to orders. The commander in chief or the ranking officer has the responsibility for the policy, and when he says, "Fire!" the command must be obeyed. But, young gentlemen, the wise leader, when occasion offers, outlines his plans, and we have learned that the best soldiers and the best sailors are those who are the best informed as well as the best trained. You will command men who will not stop to "reason why" when orders are given to fire, but they are American youths of intelligence and ambition who will find the why and the reason, and the closer they are in touch with their officers and the better they are instructed the more efficient the ship. Discipline is a part of loyalty, but shipmates in the American Navy are comrades from American homes, and officer and seaman must have a mutual understanding and appreciation to insure a happy ship, for John Paul Jones tells us that 'the only good ship is a happy ship,' and happy ships owe their happiness to good fellowship of all the shipmates from the highest to the lowest rank.

"Young gentlemen, with your training and knowledge obtained here, follow the gleam of high tradition, honorable loyalty, love of your calling, and faith in the Almighty who rules upon the deep as upon the land.

"As you are welcomed to-day into the comradeship of a noble profession, as you weigh anchor from this protected harbor and sail into the larger sea of life, I commend to each of you the prayer of the Breton mariner on the stormy waste of the northwest coast of France:

"My God, protect me. My ship is so little. Thy ocean is so great."

What the Democratic Administration has Done for the West.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit some remarks upon the subject of public-land legislation and the work of the Interior Department pertaining to the West. The work of the Democratic administration in the interest of the progress and development of the West is unparalleled, and it came at a time when it was sorely needed. The remaining natural resources in public ownership are largely in the Western States. As a result of a period of conservation, so-called, run mad, of misunderstanding, of lack of sympathy with western aspirations and institutions, and of profound want of vision, these great resources, mineral, power, land, and timber, were tied up with withdrawals or hedged about with impossible restrictions until the whole tendency was backward or at a standstill. Eastern men, who utterly failed to grasp western conditions, were directing western affairs. Every man who sought to avail himself of the privileges granted by law was regarded as a thief. Future generations were apparently considered of more importance than those now living. Use, development, progress, encouragement, good faith, hard work, and a square deal represented ideas that seemed to be in the discard. Never was the West in greater need of constructive statesmanship at Washington than on March 4, 1913.

The record of the administration of the Interior Department during the Roosevelt and Taft administrations, in its treatment of the poor people who were honestly trying to obtain homes and develop the arid States of the West, is the most unkind and cold-blooded page in all our Nation's history. The pioneer settlers of the West were during those years persecuted by a rabid, unreasoning, and wantonly cruel policy of so-called conservation. The legislature of every Western State during those years repeatedly memorialized the President and Congress and the Interior Department for relief from the intolerable and outrageous hardships inflicted upon those States by the narrow and infamously harsh administration of the public-land laws.

For many years before the inauguration of President Wilson our Republican friends had persistently rung the changes on the brazen assertion that the Democrats were without capacity to govern; that they were only fit for the minority party; that they never could formulate and carry out great constructive, forward-looking policies. Were the accomplishments of this Democratic administration limited to what has been done for the West, let alone its other great achievements, it would be enough forever to refute the slander that the Democrats are incapable of doing things. And this is no mere campaign fulmination; the record speaks for itself. It is written in a million places—in the statute books and departmental files, and it is written forever in the hearts and minds of the western people. That there may be no misunderstanding about it, I have collated a brief summary of some of the acts of the Democratic Congress and the accomplishments of the Democratic executive departments affecting western interests. The mere summary is long, but it is a catalogue of cold facts, of patriotic and splendid constructive measures, of permanent and good work well and faithfully done, such as must convince any but those determined not to believe, of the absolute truth of the sweeping assertions I am making; and, believe me, the West knows its friends, and no species of camouflage is going to delude our people as to who have been their benefactors. The keynote to this wonderful record has been intelligent teamwork by men with a high purpose and independent thought, who were not shackled or controlled by any particular interest or ulterior motive, always the chief factor in a strong and effective democracy.

History will record that Franklin K. Lane was not only one of the greatest Secretaries that this Nation has ever had, but one of the most patriotic, broad-gauged, wise, and humane statesmen that our country has ever produced; and the Nation at large, and especially the West, will for all time be benefited by and grateful to him for the splendid work he did during his seven years' administration of the Interior Department. I also want to say that Secretary Lane, as the head of that great department, was fortunate in being at all times ably, loyally and patriotically, and earnestly and wisely supported by the heads of the various bureaus in his department. The Hon. Clay Tallman, Commissioner of the General Land Office, is, like Secretary Lane, a western man, and, like the Secretary, he personally knows and appreciates the difficulties of western development and has always fully realized and sympathized with the hardships, privations, and heart-breaking disappointments that confront the public-land settlers, and he has worked as hard and as conscientiously and has accomplished fully as much during his term of office, and, I believe, much more, than any other Commissioner of the General Land Office has ever accomplished during a similar period.

But let me be a little more specific. Seven years ago Alaska, our last great frontier country, had been practically abandoned. All plans or projects for opening that great storehouse of wealth and opportunity had ended in speculation and talk, and then more talk. That to render the interior accessible and to provide suitable laws for Alaskan development were the things to do, was too manifest for argument. Instead of talk, the Democratic administration proceeded to do these things.

Out on our Indian reservations poverty, disease, and ignorance were characteristic; though the Indian had millions of acres of land, he had no cattle, no water for irrigation, no tools or stock with which to farm, and, worst of all, nobody was disposed to improve his condition; a spirit of hopelessness seemed to prevail. Now that is all changed. The whole status and condition of the Indian is headed the other way—prosperity, civilization, citizenship are in sight for the Indian.

Our great Government reclamation projects which had cost a hundred millions, now the pride of the West, hung in the balance; doubt existed as to the reimbursement of the Government as contemplated by the law, but more serious was the question in men's minds as to whether great development enterprises of this sort could be carried through successfully by the Government. The money had been expended honestly, the engineering had been of a high order, the dams stood, the water was made available, yet there was something lacking; the land was not fully settled; the settlers were complaining and unprosperous. Then came the searching analysis of the situation by the incoming Democratic administration, followed by new laws and different policies; help, encouragement, fair treatment, until now it is a demonstrated fact that the Government can do big things on a business basis, and every Western State is clamoring for more Government irrigation projects, not as a gift, but on a basis of returning to the Government every dollar invested.

As to our remaining public agricultural and grazing lands, it was apparent that, for the most part, the crop lands were gone; that the lands remaining were essentially grazing in character; and that existing laws were unsuited to give the little man a chance. That situation was studied and laws enacted to meet it; the result has been little less than marvelous, and the Land Service, which was supposed to be a declining Government function gradually going out of business, has, during this entire administration, been one of the busiest of the Government activities. Then, too, there was a prevailing sentiment in the West that the Government and its agents were chiefly concerned with making trouble for those who sought to exercise their rights under the public-land laws, however good their intentions, rather than to help and to encourage. It has not been easy to overcome this prejudice, but now the good-faith homesteader knows he has nothing to fear, and the grafter finds little comfort.

Our coal-land laws were archaic, hopelessly impracticable, and an incentive to fraud. Our oil resources, now of such vast importance, were tied up in the Taft withdrawals "in aid of legislation" which had not been enacted. Claimants proceeding under the existing laws suddenly found themselves precipitated into a quagmire of destructive litigation. The conflicting interests, including those of the Government, were most difficult to adjust, but now, by a measure essentially Democratic in its origin, that matter has been straightened out in a manner fair to the claimants, protective of every legitimate public interest, and at the same time placing this great industry on a sound basis, conducive to well-regulated use and development. The same thing may be said of the water-power bill, which was earnestly worked upon by Congress for years and has just been submitted to and signed by President Wilson.

And with all these multitudinous problems we did not overlook the preservation and opening to public enjoyment of the great natural beauty spots and pleasure grounds in our country. For years the idea has persisted that foreign countries excelled our own in the way of magnificent natural scenery; for years thousands of our people have gone abroad to see mountains, waterfalls, lakes, and glaciers, unmindful that our own country had unsurpassed attractions and opportunities of this kind. We created the National Park Service; we created new parks; we have made them accessible to the public and have educated the public to know and appreciate the wonders and the attractiveness of our own country.

In these brief statements I have attempted to sketch only a few of the larger things to which we have given attention. The record shows that every interest and every aspect of western development has been under consideration. Our whole course of procedure has been inspired with a desire for a sane, well-balanced, well-regulated, progressive development and use of our national resources in the interest of the whole public, and in doing this we have lived up to every sound principle of conservation and protection of the public interests. I invite the earnest attention of everybody to the summary of the record which I am submitting. In it will be found more than 30 measures passed by the Democratic administration of direct benefit to the West; in it will be found evidence that these measures have been administered and enforced by the Democratic executive departments in a spirit at once agressive, fair, reasonable, humane. The tremendous results will be well understood by everyone who comprehends the resources, development, and people of the West.

I feel that without impropriety I can speak with first-hand information upon this subject. As the House well knows, I have been a member of the Public Lands Committee for nearly 12 years, during a large period of which time I have been the ranking member and at times the acting chairman, and a very large part of this legislation has necessarily come from that committee. Without mentioning the bills in detail I feel that I may take a just pride in having been the author of quite a large number of them and in having taken an active part in the passage of all of them. And I will take this occasion to add that all of the members of the Public Lands Committee deserve great credit for the constant, arduous, and tedious work of that committee, which is one of the hardest working committees and produces more legislative bills than any other committee in Congress.

LEGISLATIVE AND ADMINISTRATIVE ACHIEVEMENTS BENEFICIAL TO THE WEST DURING THE WILSON ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. Speaker, never before in the history of our country during the same length of time has so much been accomplished to render available the resources of our public domain and at the same time make the acquisition of title less burdensome to the intending claimant. Without regard to hundreds of acts of Congress of local and purely remedial character, but taking a few of those equally applicable throughout the public land States, the following deserve much more than the very brief mention I am able to give them:

(1) Unrestricted patent: The act of April 14, 1914 (38 Stat., 336), provides for the issuance of an unrestricted patent where theretofore patent had been issued limited to surface rights only, and subsequently the lands so patented have been classified as noncoal in character. By this statute the servitude imposed by the reservation of coal in the land is absolutely removed and the homesteader gets a clear title.

(2) Agricultural entry with reservation of mineral to the United States: The act of July 17, 1914 (38 Stat., 509), provides for agricultural entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals with the reservation of the minerals to the United States. By this act the conservation of our valuable mineral resources is accomplished, and at the same time the surface of the land within which such minerals are found is subject to appropriation for agricultural uses. The farmer and the stock grower can make full use of the land included within his entry or purchase under a title that excludes the mineral deposits therefrom. In the absence of legislation of this character the known presence of mineral in public lands would exclude it from all appropriation, except under the mining laws. By this act an exceedingly important step has been taken toward securing an effective conservation of our public domain without interfering with the present and profitable use thereof.

(3) Contracts with oil and gas applicants: The act of August 25, 1914 (38 Stat., 708), authorized the Secretary of the Interior to enter into agreements, under such conditions as he may prescribe, with applicants for patents for oil or gas lands, relative to the disposition of the oil or gas pending final determination of title to the land. Under the contract authorized by this wise legislation, applicants were enabled to proceed with the production of oil on condition of the deposit of an escrow returnable in the event of favorable action upon their applications, the escrow thus deposited, up to the beginning of the present year, amounting to $7,784,796.76.

(4) Relief of desert-land entrymen: The act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1138), granted a further extension of time within which entrymen could show compliance with the desert-land law, or secure an entry of the lands by perfecting his entry in the manner required under the homestead law. This legislation was very timely, as the increasing difficulties encountered by desert-land entrymen were recognized in securing a sufficient supply of water to effect reclamation of their lands, due to the general appropriation of the waters in all of the smaller streams. The necessity for this legislation is apparent when it is known that favorable action was taken on approximately 2,000 claims under this act.

(5) Enlarged homesteads: The original enlarged homestead act of 1909 was practically made over during the present administration by the acts of March 3, 1915 (38 Stat., 956), March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1161), and the act of July 3, 1916 (39 Stat., 344), by which (1) the original act was so amended as to permit an additional entry to be made, although proof might have already been submitted on the original; (2) applications were authorized for the entry of lands not theretofore designated as subject to enlarged homestead entry with a provision that the application should constitute a segregation of the lands thus applied for, under which provision many thousands of applications were shortly made thereafter; and (3) by the addition of a new section whereby persons who have made entry of less than 320 acres of land designated as nonirrigable and who shall have submitted final proof, shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of the enlarged homestead act, public land not contiguous to the first entry, which shall not, with the original, exceed 320 acres. The necessity for the modification of the original enlarged homestead act became apparent in the course of its administration, and the acts above cited were the result of such conclusion, by which the act as a whole has been made appropriate to the present conditions of the public domain.

(6) Leave of absence for homestead settlers: The act of July 3, 1916 (39 Stat., 341), authorizes a leave of absence to homestead settlers on unsurveyed lands. For many years the Land Department was the recipient of a large number of letters from settlers upon unsurveyed land asking if there was any law under which they could secure a leave of absence without risk of losing their claims. Up to the passage of this beneficent act no such relief under the law existed. Now all qualified persons who have heretofore or may hereafter, in good faith, settle upon and improve unsurveyed, unreserved, unappropriated public lands with the intention, upon survey, of entering the same under the homestead law may secure a leave of absence not exceeding in the aggregate five months in each year after the establishment of residence. This act in itself is a fine recognition of the conditions attendant upon securing a home by the average settler upon the public domain, and equalizes to some degree the claims of settlers on surveyed and unsurveyed lands.

(7) Phosphate mining claims: The act of January 11, 1915 (38 Stat., 792), validating placer locations of phosphate deposits, not only relieved the department of a troublesome line of litigation as between rival claimants, but gave relief to a large number of claimants who had theretofore been confronted with the possibility of losing the results of their previous expenditures of time, labor, and money through an honest mistake in attempting to protect their discoveries of the mineral phosphate under a placer instead of a lode location. The peculiar geologic conditions in which these beds of phosphate occur are such that much difference of opinion existed for a considerable time as to whether they were properly lode or placer deposits, and in the meantime claims were in equally good faith asserted under both lode and placer locations. Congress and the department finally held, however, that phosphate rock was only locatable as a lode, the result of which conclusion was to endanger all placer locations of phosphate, although made in the best of good faith. This act deals with the conditions thus brought about and provides substantially that where placer locations of phosphate rock have theretofore been made and the law duly complied with such location shall be valid, and patents, whether heretofore or hereafter issued thereon, shall give title to and possession of such deposits.

OREGON & CALIFORNIA LAND GRANT.

The manner in which the Democratic Congress and the present administration met the problem presented by the decision of the United States Supreme Court when it held that the only interest the Oregon & California Co. had in the remainder of the unsold portion of its grant was $2.50 per acre, remitting at the same time to Congress the question of the requisite legislation, affords an excellent illustration of what can be done when Congress and the Executive work together, as they did in this instance.

Some 2,300,000 acres of land were involved when Congress convened, and a large number of bills were introduced proposing many and widely different methods of treating these lands, but at this point the remarkable teamwork of the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture prevented what might very easily have become a legislative tangle out of which no particular results would have been secured. Out of all the bills introduced one was selected which was believed to embody substantially what would be the true principle governing this legislation, and this bill, known as the Chamberlain bill, was thereupon made the subject of special consideration, wherein the Attorney General addressed himself to the law of the case, leaving questions of administrative policies to the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture. Thus proceeding after extended hearings before the House Committee on the Public Lands, wherein the proposed legislative measures were considered, the bill was reported out of the committee that passed both Houses and received the approval of the President June 9, 1916 (39 Stat., 218), an act which was later declared not only constitutional by the United States Supreme Court but fully within the intent of its prior decision.

The value of these lands has been estimated at various figures from thirty to fifty million dollars, or even more, for this grant embraced a strip of land across the entire western end of Oregon, including within its boundaries some of the finest and most heavily timbered land remaining in the United States.

The act revesting these lands requires classification in the field before disposal of the lands, for the opening of the agricultural lands to homestead entry, the sale of the timber on the land classified as timberland, and the withdrawal of land valuable for power site. Also, for the payment of the accrued taxes on the land revested in the United States.

Acting under these provisions, the General Land Office has, up to date, classified in the field 2,175,000 acres, cruised 30,000,000,000 feet of timber, opened to entry 810,000 acres, sold the timber on 9,577 acres for $341,985, and ascertained and paid accrued taxes to the extent of $1,529,947.

COOS BAY WAGON ROAD LANDS.

A situation somewhat similar to that under the Oregon & California grant exists in the case of the grant to the Coos Bay Wagon Road, resulting in proceedings to secure the forfeiture of its grant so far as its unsold lands were concerned, some 93,000 acres. However, as the Oregon & California case in the Supreme Court had been decided against the company and under its holding sent the matter to Congress for further legislation, it seemed best to take over these lands from the company on the payment of $2.50 per acre, practically along the same line as that followed in the Oregon & California case. So Congress, on February 25, 1919 (40 Stat., 1197), authorized this course to be taken. Under this act the Land Office has classified all the land in the field, paid taxes to the amount of $547,224, and sold the timber on 1,120 acres for $80,811.30.

By this legislation the United States recovered possession and ownership of valuable timber lands at a time when the value of our forest land has come to be understood, and opened to settlement thousands of acres that otherwise would have remained unappropriated for an extended period.

POTASH LANDS.

The passage of the act of October 2, 1917 (40 Stat., 297), authorizing explorations for and disposition of potash is an excellent illustration of the promptness with which Congress and the present administration handle matters in which the welfare of the Nation is involved. Due to the war with Germany our general supply of potash was largely cut off—a very serious proposition both to the manufacture of our munitions as well as the agricultural necessities of the country.

The general leasing bill which had been pending for sometime contained a section dealing with potash deposits and providing for leasing thereof; but there being so many diverse interests bound up in this piece of legislation, it was seen that if anything was done to relieve the potash situation it must be independently of the general bill. So the department drafted a bill of its own to cover the potash situation and submitted the matter to Congress, which promptly carried it into enactment as of the date above, whereupon the department in turn promptly issued permits and leases provided in the act, resulting in 326 applications for permits for the fiscal year ending 1918. There are now outstanding under this act 11 potash leases and 150 permits.

ALASKA RAILROAD CONSTRUCTION.

The railroad enterprise that will open up the Territory of Alaska from the seacoast to the central interior is distinctly a Democratic proposition, proposed in the first report of the Secretary of the Interior under the present administration, promptly followed by the passage of the act of March 12, 1914, Thirty-eighth Statutes, 305, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska. The road is now more than two-thirds complete, and sufficient appropriations have been made to insure its final completion from Seward to Fairbanks. This conception and execution of the scheme of thus opening up the possibilities of the Territory to future development does not find its parallel in the history of our country. True it is that heretofore Congress has granted lands in the aid of construction of railroads, but it was reserved to a Democratic Congress to authorize the construction of a road by the Executive. The manner in which this trust has been executed further attests the competence and capacity of the Democratic administration not only to handle enterprises involving the expenditure of immense sums of money but also to assume the responsibility of pioneer engineering many thousands of miles from the base of supplies. Without means of transportation to the central portions of the Territory, it would have remained practically undeveloped for an indeterminate period, but already the road now is in regular operation, with trains running on schedule between Seward and Anchorage and Anchorage and the Matanuska coal fields, with many small towns growing up at various points along the constructed road, and Anchorage, a city of 3,000, as headquarters of railroad construction.

COAL LEASES IN ALASKA.

The act of October 20, 1914, Thirty-eighth Statutes, 741, providing for the leasing of coal lands in Alaska, should be considered in connection with the railroad building in the Territory, for each is in effect the complement of the other, and together serve the same common purpose of substantial and permanent development of the resources of the Territory. This act is also the result of cooperative work between the Democratic Congress and the Wilson administration. At the time when this administration took charge of public affairs it found the coal lands in Alaska tied up by withdrawals and over 1,000 claims pending, against which stood charges both civil and criminal, all of which were taken up and cleared out of the way in time to put into successful operation the coal-leasing act, under which we now have leases in the Matanuska coal field, the Bering River coal field, and several other points in the Territory.

FREE HOMESTEAD SURVEYS IN ALASKA.

Among the other notable instances of provision for the welfare and convenience of homestead settlers in Alaska is found the act of June 28, 1918 (40 Stat., 632), providing for the free survey of homesteads where the settler had gone upon unsurveyed lands. As the law stood prior to that time, settlers on unsurveyed lands in the Territory were required to have the survey made at their own expense, which was almost prohibitive on account of the cost, especially in the item of transportation; but to the department it seemed that the Government should make these surveys without expense to the settlers, on the general theory that public lands are offered to settlers unburdened with the cost of survey, and this should equally be applicable in Alaska, by the execution of the survey after entry without cost to the entryman, instead of prior thereto as elsewhere. The department, therefore, drafted the bill making provision in accordance with these views, and the Democratic Congress promptly responded with its approval by the passage of the bill.

RESURVEYS.

The act of September 21, 1918 (40 Stat., 965), authorizing resurveys on an equitable division of the cost between the applicant and the Government in proportion to the extent of their respective holdings, is a piece of legislation that can not fail to commend itself to settlers and land owners in many portions of the Western States.

In many instances, especially in Wyoming, Colorado, and Nebraska, there were many calls for resurveys, due either to a defective original survey or excessive obliteration. Under the law as it stood formerly, a resurvey in such cases was not permissible where the disposals of the land were in excess of 50 per cent of the total area of the township. Under this law, however, it is possible to secure surveys on each party; that is, the United States and the applicant dividing equitably the proportion of the expense and thus giving the owner of the land a well-defined official survey of his farm, with all uncertainties as to boundaries absolutely removed.

WAR RELIEF LEGISLATION.

During this period of time Congress has not been inattentive to the protection of homestead settlers, entrymen, and other claimants under the public-land laws who may have been, due to various causes arising out of the war with Germany, either absent from the lands covered by their claims or in other ways prevented from making due compliance with the law. Among the statutes thus enacted are—

(1) The act of July 28, 1917 (40 Stat., 248), for the relief of homestead settlers, applicants, and entrymen.

(2) The act of July 17, 1917 (40 Stat., 243), to relieve the owners of mining claims from performing assessment work.

(3) The act of August 7, 1917 (40 Stat., 250), for the protection of desert-land claimants.

(4) The act of August 10, 1917 (40 Stat., 273), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend certain provisions as to residence under the reclamation laws.

(5) The act of October 5, 1917 (40 Stat., 343), relieving mining claimants from performance of annual assessment work during the years 1917 and 1918.

(6) Act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat., 391), authorizing the execution of affidavits of soldiers before commanding officer.

(7) Act of December 20, 1917 (40 Stat., 430), authorizing the absence of homesteader for purpose of engaging in farm labor.

(8) Act of March 8, 1918 (40 Stat., 448), affording general protection to the civil rights of persons in the military service.

(9) Act of August 31, 1918, section 8 (40 Stat., 957), authorizing homestead entry by soldiers under the age of 21.

(10) Act of February 25, 1919 (40 Stat., 1161), extending the provisions of the homestead law in the matter of credit for the period of enlistment to the soldiers, nurses, and officers of the Army and Navy.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEAD.

An excellent illustration of the effective teamwork of the legislative and executive branches of the Government during the Wilson administration is furnished in the story of the origin and passage of the stock-raising homestead act of December 29, 1916 (39 Stat., 862). Prior to its passage, the department had made a careful study of the character and potential value of our remaining agricultural lands, arriving at the conclusion that the area of the homestead entry should be measured by the earning capacity of the land, and as the greater part of our unappropriated agricultural lands were now largely better suited to grazing than other agricultural uses, it was the view of the Interior Department, which found acceptance at the hands of Congress, that the men of small means who desired to engage in stock growing on the public lands should be given an opportunity. With this end in view, the provisions of the stock-raising act were formulated, and are now in course of administration. As an evidence that the public needs and desires were properly interpreted by Congress at the time it enacted this law, it is sufficient to call attention to the fact that since the passage of the act, the Geological Survey, up to April 30, 1920, has acted upon 59,861 petitions, resulting in the designation of 42,613,675 acres, with 18,964 petitions yet pending, with petitions still coming in at the rate of 1,500 per month; that during the fiscal year 1919 the total number of entries allowed were 15,037, covering an area of 5,559,235 acres, while the area entered up to March 1, 1920, was 11,562,520 acres. This act rests upon the recognition that the only sound theory for the permanent development of our public lands, exclusive of their mineral content, can only be secured by uniting ownership with settlement and use of the lands with taxation under the laws of the State.

The 640-acre stock-raising homestead law, together with the three-year homestead law, are two of my pet measures; and while I do not claim the sole authorship by any means of either one of them, I think no one who knows the years of persistent and hard work that were necessary to bring about the enactment of those two measures will dispute the compliment that my friends have often given me for being largely personally responsible for bringing about their enactment, and I feel that no two bills have ever been passed that will do more toward the settlement of the West and furnish homes to deserving people, in view of the character of the remaining public domain, than those two measures, and I am supremely proud and gratified in having had a part in their enactment.

IMPORTANT THINGS ACCOMPLISHED BY THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE DURING LAST SEVEN YEARS, 1913–1920.

In the last seven years, notwithstanding the rapidly diminishing public domain and new legislation, with consequent difficulties of administration, both in the office and the field, the General Land Office has made a magnificent record not only in things accomplished but in perfecting a more efficient organization. It has surveyed 90,855,826 acres; in fact, reorganized the procedure for surveys within railroad grant limits, whereby the survey of 1,250,000 acres in one surveying season was effected, as against one-half that acreage under former methods, and placed all work in the offices of surveyors general on a uniform, business basis. It has allowed original entries of public and Indian lands for 106,372,021 acres, including 11,562,520 acres as stock-raising homesteads, and issued patents for 91,604,204 acres, including 56,988,574 acres under the homestead law.

The steadily decreasing efforts to secure public lands through fraudulent entries during the last seven years attest the constant vigilance of the field service, and its more effective work in the prevention of fraudulent entries than under former administrations. Big frauds are a thing of the past, while smaller cases calling for the cancellation of an entry have fallen from 4,004, in 1912, to 494, in 1919, but this result has not been secured without great effort, 157,964 cases having been investigated and reported by the field service during that period, and 2,634,850 acres recovered through its agency.

In new lines of business, patents for 904,360 acres have been issued under the Minnesota drainage act; of Oregon and California revested lands 2,175,000 acres have been classified in the field, 30,000,000,000 feet of timber cruised, 810,000 acres opened to entry, $341,985.84 received for timber sold, and accrued taxes ascertained and paid in the sum of $1,529,947.57; of Coos Bay wagon-road grant lands 93,078 acres have been classified in the field, $547,224.10 of taxes paid, and timber sold for $80,811.30; while in the administration of the act of August 25, 1914, the office has secured as escrow deposits with oil-land claimants, under said act and special agreements, up to December 31, 1919, $7,784,796.76. It has obtained judicial decrees awarding title to the United States for valuable oil lands in Louisiana which would have otherwise been lost to the United States, with producing oil wells thereon, and judgment for $462,903, as well as judicial decrees quieting title in the United States for 75,000 acres of Arkansas "sunk" lands, conservatively valued at $4,000,000, and Arkansas "lake" lands valued at $1,000,000. In the restoration to entry of withdrawn or reserved lands new methods of procedure have been devised whereby contests and litigation are practically eliminated.

In the course of these transactions the General Land Office has collected from all sources $43,411,678.62, and expended for maintenance of service $22,838,157.28, with a surplus of receipts over expenditures of $20,573,521.34.

THE RECLAMATION SERVICE.

The West is especially interested in the Reclamation Service and the administration of that branch of the Interior Department in the reclaiming of the arid lands of the West. I feel that I would be unmindful of both an efficient public service well done and the due appreciation of the West if I did not say that during the past seven years a very large part of the wonderful success of the Reclamation Service in reclaiming the arid lands of the West and furnishing homes for the people has been due to the able, conscientious, and earnest efforts of the Hon. Arthur P. Davis, director and chief engineer.

As a ranking member for many years of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, which has jurisdiction of the reclamation legislative matters, and as chairman of that committee for a considerable portion of the time, and having taken an active part in all legislation on that subject and been the author of several of the measures, I can speak understandingly upon the work accomplished by the Reclamation Service.

During the past seven years the Reclamation Service has been actively engaged in the investigation, survey, construction, operation, and maintenance of irrigation works in the arid States.

It has built the Arrowrock Dam on the Boise River, Idaho, the highest in the world, and the Elephant Butte Dam on the Rio Grande, N. Mex., storing the greatest quantity of irrigation water.

Other construction included 5,000 miles of canals, 6 miles of tunnels, bridges, drops, checks, turnouts, and other smaller structures totaling over 60,000 in number, 2,000,000 feet of pipe line, 270,000 feet of flume, 300 miles of roads, 40 miles of railroad, 1,000 miles of telephone line and 300 of transmission line, utilizing power developed by the works to the extent of 37,000 horsepower. Eighty-two million cubic yards of earth and rock were excavated and 6,000,000 cubic yards placed in dams and dikes. A million and a half cubic yards of riprap, 400,000 square yards of paving, and 2,000,000 cubic yards of concrete were built, using 1,500,000 barrels of cement, large quantities of which were sand cement manufactured on the ground.

These works brought irrigation water to 1,000,000 acres of formerly desert land, now intensively cultivated, making possible 15,000 farm homes in the arid region.

The service operated and maintained 25 large storage reservoirs, 10,000 miles of canals and related works, delivering water to 2,000,000 acres. The lands thus served produced crops estimated to be worth $140,000,000 in the year 1919 and approximately a half billion dollars during the past seven years.

THE EXTENSION ACT.

At the advent of this administration settlers on Government reclamation projects found themselves seriously embarrassed by reason of their inability to meet the construction charges and at the same time reclaim and improve their farms. Consideration of this situation led to the act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stat., 686), by which the time for payment for water rights under reclamation projects was extended from 10 to 20 years. This legislation is another one of my pet measures and is of far-reaching beneficent character, enabling the entryman to employ his capital to a much greater advantage in preparing his land for cultivation and securing the necessary implements and stock for the proper development of his land.

This legislation has been to a large extent responsible for the phenomenal growth and increase of values and productive capacity on reclamation projects during the last seven years. Systems are now complete to supply 1,780,000 acres of land, and storage reservoirs are furnishing a supplemental water supply to a million acres additional in other projects. The accomplishments of the Reclamation Service during the present administration have demonstrated the capacity of the Government to conduct large enterprises of this kind successfully, and to protect and reimburse the heavy expenditures of the Government in the reclamation of arid lands. Now on these projects there are 40,000 prosperous home-owning families. The present annual crop returns are now more than $70,000,000, not including the value of crops grown on a million acres outside of projects which are supplied by storage waters.

SECOND ENTRY OF FARM UNIT.

The act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1215), authorizes a homesteader within a reclamation project who finds that the land entered was not susceptible of reclamation to select and make a new entry of any farm unit within the irrigation project with credit on the new entry for the time of residence shown on the first.

COOPERATIVE RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The act of August 11, 1916 (39 Stat., 506), provides for cooperation between the United States and State irrigation districts where the districts include unpatented or unentered lands of the United States. This act will be of great service in those communities where the land in private ownership would not in the absence of cooperation be of sufficient acreage to justify the installation of irrigation works.

ASSIGNMENT OF RECLAMATION ENTRIES.

The act of May 8, 1916 (39 Stat., 65), authorizes the assignment of entries after satisfactory proof of residence, improvements, and cultivation of same, as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act.

A BRIEF SUMMARY OF THE MORE IMPORTANT ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE BUREAU OF MINES, 1913–1919.

I want, at the outset, to pay a tribute to the skill, tact, profound professional knowledge and executive ability of Dr. H. Van Manning. His administration as Director of the Bureau of Mines has not only redounded to the great benefit of the entire country, and the West in particular, but he has displayed an energy and resourcefulness that has developed that bureau from a new and straggling and comparatively unimportant service to one of the greatest practical and scientific activities in our Government. He richly deserves all of the splendid things that have been said about him during the recent months.

The Bureau of Mines, created in 1910, in response to the insistent demands of the people that something be done to reduce the terrible mortality toll in mining, the most hazardous of our industries, has during the last seven years succeeded in reducing the number of the hazards that have caused many deaths in the past. Fully 5,000 lives of miners have been saved from death, and a half million from injury, in the army of more than a million men who toil in the dark recesses under the ground. In fact, human life in the mines to-day has a new value through the work of the Bureau of Mines. In the last seven years, influenced, no doubt, by the example of the Federal Government in its humane, progressive attitude toward the miner, nearly every State in the Union has adopted compensation laws that provide for the widows and orphans of the victims of industrial dangers. These laws cover not only mining but all of the industries, so that to-day it is not necessary for the widow to engage in an unequal and often losing fight with the industries for enough to keep herself and her family.

The bureau, in its life-saving campaign, maintains in the various mining districts of the country 11 mine-rescue cars and 5 automobile mine-rescue trucks, with crews of expert life-savers, who respond to calls of disaster. Many entombed miners who otherwise would have perished have been saved by the rescuers of the bureau and by men trained by the bureau. More than 30,000 miners have been trained in modern, effective rescue work, so that whenever a disaster occurs there are expert miners nearby who know the bureau's methods and assist the crews of the bureau in rescue work. The bureau in this connection has developed two improved types of mine-rescue apparatus, which are considered far superior to the apparatus used in Europe. This apparatus, supplying oxygen to the wearer, permits rescuers to live in deadly atmospheres of mines following explosions for a period of two hours.

More than 100,000 miners have been trained in modern first-aid-to-the-injured work. These men bind up the wounds of miners in such skillful manner that injuries formerly serious and sometimes fatal are robbed of their terrors. Miners are able through this expert service to return to their work much sooner and are thereby saved the expense of enforced idleness. It is thought that thousands of lives have been saved through this service, and injuries lessened.

The bureau called public attention to the fact that the radium-bearing ores of the West were being exploited and sent to Europe to be made into radium and sold back to this country at fabulous prices, developed processes for producing radium at one-third the previous cost, and through cooperation with the National Radium Institute produced 9 grams of radium worth at market price considerably more than a million dollars. This radium is to be used in the United States in the treatment of cancer and other malignant growth. With 75,000 deaths each year in the United States from cancer, it will be seen what a boon the Bureau of Mines has been able to confer on humanity through these radium investigations.

Through the introduction by the Bureau of Mines of improved methods of drilling and casing oil wells millions of dollars' worth of oil and natural gas have been saved. The bureau has also devised a method for estimating the future production of oil wells and devised a process for making gasoline by what is known as the "cracking" process.

The bureau rendered important aid to the United States and her allies during the war. It first mobilized the chemical brains of the country, classified them, and saw that the war-making powers were supplied promptly with expert services, and in cooperation with the War and Navy Departments built plants for recovering helium from natural gas in Texas. Helium is a noninflammable gas which the Allies during the war were preparing to use in dirigibles to destroy the enemy when the armistice came. It was looked upon as an epoch-making discovery, and it was hoped that its use would change the war in favor of the Allies in a short time. Dirigibles using this new gas and loaded with powerful explosives could go anywhere over the enemy's territory without the danger of being brought down by incendiary bullets.

During the war it conducted comprehensive surveys of needed minerals, of the sources of sulphuric acid, aided in constructing plants for making nitric acid and sodium cyanide, and had charge of the gas warfare station at American University until June, 1918, where the manufacture of gas masks and deadly war gases had been developed.

The bureau, at the request of the French Government, developed for military purposes the geophone, a delicate listening device for detecting enemy tunneling operations. Now the geophone has been adopted to locate entombed miners following disasters in mines.

UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY—WORK DONE 1913–1919.

No one can ever think of the United States Geological Survey without thinking of Dr. George Otis Smith, who has for so many years been the efficient director. While the West has many times felt that he has been an ultra-conservationist, at the same time all will gladly say that he has at all times conscientiously and with wonderful energy and executive ability conducted the great responsibility of that office and always protected the rights of the Government, and the future, as well as the present, will always accord to him the distinction of having rendered a great and lasting service to our country.

I can not in the limited space allotted to me do justice to the tremendous amount and variety of the work performed by the Geological Survey. I can only mention a very brief summary, from which a partial idea may be obtained of the great variety and ramifications of the work of the Geological Survey.

The geologic work done is not readily measurable by areas. Its results are embodied in more than 500 reports, which cover not only areas but particular deposits, formations, groups of fossils, and so forth. Determinations and analyses of more than 10,000 samples of rocks and minerals were made in the laboratory of the survey.

The survey's work on mineral resources involved the collection of statistics from more than 100,000 producers of about 80 minerals, and its results were published in 428 chapters comprising more than 15,000 pages.

The work done in Alaska included 41,861 square miles of topographic mapping and 40,516 square miles of geologic mapping.

The topographic work done in the United States proper during 1913–1919 included 130,250 square miles of new surveys, 17,664 square miles of resurveys, 40,354 linear miles of levels run, 12,649 bench marks set, 1,168 triangulation stations established, 613 linear miles of primary traverse run, and 2,985 linear miles of river surveys made. The published results of the topographic work are given in 831 maps and 48 books publications.

The work of classifying the public lands comprised the following items:

	Acres.
Coal land classified	14,316,665
Noncoal land restored to entry	30,479,512
Possible oil land widrawn from entry	2,841,844
Nonoil land restored	1,003,382
Possible phosphate land withdrawn	832,006
Nonphosphate land restored	1,456,689
Possible potash land withdrawn	345,213
Nonpotash land restored	215,104
Possible oil-shale land classified	4,122,121
Nonoil-shale land restored	8,824
Possible water-power sites withdrawn	1,090,369
Possible water-power sites restored	338,595
Enlarged homesteads designated	106,913,170
Enlarged homesteads canceled	9,353,089
Stock-raising homesteads designated	24,923,951
Stock-raising homesteads canceled	8,320
Possible water reserves withdrawn	148,784
Possible water reserves restored	9,405

In its work on the water resources of the country, the Survey maintained, in cooperation with other organizations, States, and so forth, an average of 1,250 gauging stations for measuring the flow of streams. The results of these measurements were published in 89 reports, covering more than 20,000 pages. Investigations of underground water, recorded in 37 separate reports, were made; 940 sign posts were erected as guides to water in desert regions, and many thousand samples of water were analyzed.

The Survey's publications comprised, in addition to the 831 topographic maps mentioned, more than 1,300 reports, covering more than 122,000 pages.

The war work of the Survey included special researches concerning deposits of minerals that are of military use and the preparation of reports on them. Studies were also made of foreign mineral deposits that are of military value. The Survey contributed 477 members of its force to the military service, of whom 79 held commissions, and 37 of those holding commissions rendered service in France, two of them on the staff of Gen. Pershing. The map-printing plant of the Survey was in continual use during the war in printing maps, charts, diagrams, and so forth.

THE BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, 1913–1920.

With the appointment of the Hon. Cato Sells as Commissioner of the Bureau of Indian Affairs the administration of that bureau and all of Uncle Sam's wards took on a new and distinct policy, and every friend of the Indians throughout the length and breadth of this country will always have a kindly feeling toward Commissioner Sells for his originality and wonderful energy and humane and splendid work in behalf of the Indians of this country.

The Indian Bureau is the most complex piece of governmental machinery. It deals with the interests of many thousands of Indians in all the relationships of individual life. Its functions ramify in every direction and touch almost all human activities.

A bare outline of its activities will be a marvelous revelation to those who are not intimately acquainted with the details of this office.

The popular fallacy that the Indian is a vanishing race is dispelled by the cold facts of an increase in the number of Indians during the last 50 years of at least 9,000.

The present administration of this bureau, at its commencement seven years ago, inaugurated an intensive health campaign which comprehended the elimination of the medicine man and his superstitious influence over the elder Indians. The success of this plan is illustrated by the interest with which the old Indians have submitted their loved ones to the tender care and gentle ministrations of trained nurses employed in the hospitals and sanatoriums which have been established at various centers of Indian populations. The influence of the modern physician and his coworker, the nurse, is more in evidence to-day than it has been in all the years of governmental supervision heretofore. At least 10,000 Indians annually have been treated in these hospitals so successfully as to overcome the old-time prejudices of these people.

The death of the race so often predicted has not materialized because of this intensive work for better health and sanitary conditions of person and home, supplemented by the "better baby" crusade, which has been a vital factor in saving from this predicted extinction the aboriginal race of our country.

The school system of the Indian Service has been organized and put upon a substantial modern vocational basis. It has placed 75 per cent of eligible Indian children in school, has increased by 50,000 the number of Indians using English, has greatly extended the attendance of Indian children in State schools, by reason of which it has made practicable the discontinuance of a dozen or more Government boarding schools and twenty-odd day schools.

The last seven years has witnessed marvelous progress in agricultural and stock-raising pursuits when compared with the past desultory efforts to develop the self-supporting instinct of the Indian as a race. This has been accomplished through intelligent supervision and constructive effort upon the part of those connected with the development of their farms and ranches.

A million acres are cultivated by 37,000 Indians. There are 47,000 Indians engaged in stock raising. Their income last year from these sources was over $14,000,000. Their tribal herds have increased in value to between three and four million dollars, as compared with $75,000 in 1913, and the value of all their live stock has increased more than $16,000,000. Their grazing ranges have been greatly widened and their surplus lands leased at better rates than ever before. A tribal flock of sheep in New Mexico netted a profit in four years of nearly $145,000 on an investment and expense of $62,000, and for the same period of time a cattle herd in Montana yielded $600,000. The deposits of individual funds of the Indians is about $20,000,000. Their investments in homes, barns, and farm implements amounts to $18,000,000.

In the last three years approximately 11,000 fee simple patents have been issued, more than were issued in the preceding 10 years, indicating remarkable increase in the number of Indians who are competent to transact their own business as ordinary white citizens are. There are now nearly 180,000 Indian citizens, of whom approximately 45,000 are entitled to vote.

The development of oil among the Osages and the Five Civilized Tribes has made wonderful strides in the last seven years and there are more than 40,000 oil and gas wells now upon restricted lands of the Five Civilized Tribes alone. These lands have produced in the last seven years about 160,000,000 barrels of oil and brought to the Indians an annual income for several years of nearly $4,000,000. In the year 1913 the Osage Indians received in oil and gas royalties and bonuses $973,822.95. Last year the oil production was 12,000,000 barrels and the cash received by the tribe amounted to nearly $11,000,000.

Oklahoma Indian lands under the control of the bureau have produced in 20 years about 400,000,000 barrels of oil worth approximately $325,000,000, from which the Indian share was close to $40,000,000. This great bureau is charged with the responsibility for the proper conservation of these great natural resources and their development, so as to produce for the Indians as great a revenue as may be consistent with production and price.

To-day there are under actual tillage nearly 300,000 acres of Indian land, the most of which, without proper irrigation, would be worthless, and of comparatively small value for grazing. This land conservatively is worth close to $60,000,000. Besides these irrigated lands there are more than 1,000,000 acres of Indian land under systems in process of construction or in contemplation. The crop returns from a single project on one reservation for the past three years had an aggregate value of the total outlay for irrigation work on all Indian reservations. The irrigated Indian lands in the Southwest are producing a long staple cotton at a net profit of more than $100 an acre.

During the past seven years the tribal herds of cattle and sheep have been made to earn for the Indians from 10 per cent to 400 per cent profit. The number of actual Indian farmers has nearly doubled.

Under its declaration of policy the Indian Bureau is rapidly enfranchising the Indian who is competent to handle his lands and moneys. While the process seems slow to a large number who are waiting like vultures to devour some defenseless Indian who probably has not measured up to the department's understanding of his competency and seeks to dispossess him of his lands and money, the Indian Bureau seems to be undeterred and is conscientiously endeavoring only to sever the Government's wardship in those cases where it manifestly is to the benefit of the Indian concerned.

It is to be noted that many of the the Indians are self-supporting, that many of the tribes have wealth, but it should not be overlooked that there still remains a large number of Indians who are not sufficiently educated to be released from Government supervision. These potential citizens should remain in tutelage for some period longer, for if released by wholesale they will soon be despoiled of their lands and moneys and become charges upon the several States. The present policy is to carefully scrutinize the applications of Indians for a fee patent to their lands, carrying with it citizenship and the right to administer their own affairs, and to see that there are reasonable grounds to believe that such an Indian is worthy of the trust to be imposed upon him and will make good use of his opportunities.

THE NATIONAL PARK SERVICE, 1913–1920.

The Hon. Stephen T. Mather, Director of the National Park Service, is another unselfish, public-spirited, and splendid public official who is devoting the best years of his life to a noble work. His service is one of the youngest in the Government, but it is starting off well, and the entire public is proud of him.

ORGANIZATION OF THE SERVICE.

The act of August 25, 1917 (39 Stat., 535), established a National Park Service and provided for its control and management by the Department of the Interior. The functions of the service include the promotion and regulation of the national parks and monuments by such means and measures as conform to the fundamental purpose of said parks and monuments and reservations, which purpose is to conserve the scenery and the natural and historic objects and the wild life therein, and to provide for the enjoyment of the same in such manner and by such means as will leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations.

At the present time the total area of the 18 national parks under control of the service is 10,739 square miles, or 6,872,960 acres, and the area of the 23 national monuments is 1,931 square miles, or 1,235,840 acres. There is one national park in the Hawaiian Islands and one in Alaska and two monuments in Alaska which are under the jurisdiction of the National Park Service, and the others are in the States west of the Mississippi. The national parks now cover an area greater than the States of Massachusetts and Delaware combined. During the fiscal year the total number of visitors to the national parks was 755,527, and to the national monuments during the same period 55,309. These figures attest the general appreciation of our home people to the attractions afforded by our national parks and monuments, and furnish some indication as to the part they will play in the future development of our western domain.

Exportation of Pulp Wood from Canada to United States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920,

On the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) authorizing the appointment of a commission to confer with the Dominion Government or the provincial governments of Quebec, Ontario, and New Brunswick as to certain restrictive orders in council of the said Provinces relative to the exportation of pulp wood therefrom to the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, very little need be added in explanation of the resolution before the House beyond the report submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The western section of Massachusetts is vitally interested in the production of paper, of which pulp wood is one of the chief components. Although pulp wood is not used in the highest grades of writing paper, it is naturally an allied industry as well as effectively used in the production of the newspapers throughout the country.

Massachusetts seems to-day to be suffering both from an embargo and from the lack of one. An embargo against pulp wood is a serious situation, and the lack of an embargo against the exportation of coal but adds to the troubles already existing in our section. Both should be given prompt attention by Government officials.

I am therefore heartily in favor of the adoption of the Underwood resolution, in the hope that the apparent shortage of pulp wood may be relieved. Such a commission as the Underwood resolution calls for could in no sense be regarded as unfriendly to the Dominion Government and would simply mean negotiations with the authorities there in an effort at mutual benefit. We do not desire to retaliate against Canada or any other foreign country in the matter of our own natural products, but we must protect our own industries and consider the needs of our people.

Western South Dakota Indian Affairs.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY L. GANDY,
OF SOUTH DAKOTA,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, a great many believe the issuance of a patent in fee gives an Indian full and complete property control and removes him from tribal participation. That you may know just how erroneous is that prevalent opinion, permit me to say that after nearly 40 years of the issuance of patents in fee to the Sioux Indians of western South Dakota there are now more names on the tribal rolls than ever before. The work of the Indian Service on the reservations and before the Indian Office in Washington has been increasing instead of decreasing. The increase has not been solely on account of births or broadening governmental activities, for upon the death of an Indian frequently the estate is divided into several shares. Births and deaths have both added to the volume of business.

The real reason why the determination of competency and the subsequent issuance of patent in fee does not decrease the tribal roll is that on no reservation in South Dakota have the rolls been closed. Children born to-day are just as much members of the tribe as the elder Indians. So long as the rolls remain unclosed just that long will it be impossible to divide the tribal estate. I have for a long time been convinced that the best interests of the Indians and the public will be served by the closing of the rolls. Then the tribal estate may be partitioned, and when an Indian is given a patent in fee he may also be given his pro rata share. Standing on his own footing, he would in that event assume the full measure of responsibility of any other citizen of the land. That separation from the tribal rolls would not interfere with the Indian's right to participate in any later distribution of funds or property to which the tribe might come into possession by virtue of pending claims.

Assuming the Secretary of the Interior had authority to declare the tribal rolls closed, the Indian appropriation bill in 1918 authorized the partitioning of tribal funds, the withdrawal from the Treasury of such tribal funds as can not be partitioned, and the depositing of said funds in banks in States in which the Indians reside. Later it was determined that specific legislation was necessary to authorize the closing of the rolls before tribal estates could be divided, and that authorization was given in the Indian appropriation bill in 1919. These provisions will hasten the day when the tribal affairs of the Indians of western South Dakota may be wound up.

A delegation of Rosebud Indians appeared before officials of the Interior Department this year and among other things urged per capita payment of $1,000,000 of the proceeds of Tripp County Indian lands. The act opening that county provided $1,000,000 should be deposited in the Treasury for 10 years, which period will soon expire. That money ought to be paid to the Indians as the law contemplated it should be, but the roll must first be closed to know definitely how many shares to divide it into. Before leaving Washington the delegation urged their tribal roll be closed and assurances were given them that by late summer of this year steps will be taken to that end. When the roll of Rosebud Reservation shall have been closed and the partitioning of the tribal funds is under way, I hope the example will be followed on other reservations. Indians will be more successful when they cease to be half ward and half free.

Every competent Indian should have his or her patent in fee and share of the tribal funds or property. Then, Mr. Speaker, the Indian Service could do what was originally intended should be done—the aged and infirm and the incompetent Indians could be very carefully looked after, protected, and assisted. The Indian Service for many years has spent too much time, far too much, trying to attend to and meddling into the business of Indian men and women who are just as competent to transact their own affairs as their white neighbors. Sooner or later these Indians must face their responsibility as citizens, and the sooner that responsibility comes after they have arrived at the age of maturity the better for them and all concerned.

THE EXPENDITURE OF INDIAN TRIBAL FUNDS.

Prior to 1916 there were practically no restrictions upon the expenditure, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, of the tribal funds of Indians. I introduced a resolution providing tribal funds should not be expended without specific authorization by Congress. Thereafter I helped draft an amendment carrying that idea and it became a law. Since then Congress has been fully advised as to all expenditures from Indian tribal funds, and doubtless a material saving to the Indians has been accomplished.

PROBATION OF INDIAN ESTATES.

I have many times before the Indian Committee and proper officials in the Department of the Interior complained of the delay in the probation of estates and the distribution of the property thereof. On many reservations the deaths have exceeded the decrees of heirship, so the probate work has been getting further behind. During the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill at the session of Congress which will convene in December, I shall urge a larger appropriation for determining the heirs of deceased Indian allottees, that this work may be promptly handled. Under the present situation there are many instances where Indians have undergone want and privation while waiting as patiently as possible for a decree of heirship and a distribution of the property or funds of the estate of a deceased relative.

SALE OF ABANDONED DAY OR BOARDING SCHOOLS OR AGENCIES.

On Rosebud Reservation a request for the sale of a 40-acre tract, formerly used as an Indian day-school site, disclosed there was no law under which abandoned day or boarding schools or agencies could be sold. I secured the enactment of legislation under which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to sell any such property in tracts of not to exceed 160 acres, the proceeds to be deposited to the credit of the Indians to whom the land belongs.

THE SIOUX CLAIMS BILL.

The Sioux Indians tried for many years to secure an opportunity to submit to the Court of Claims their claim for misappropriation of land, commonly known as the Black Hills claim, and other claims which individual bands of the Sioux may have. They are very positive in their assertions that they were practically forced to cede the Black Hills country and did not receive consideration therefor commensurate to its value. Since I have been a Member of Congress I have striven to give them their day in court, and a law has been passed authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine their case.

DEPOSITING OF INDIAN FUNDS.

Individual Indian funds are for the most part on deposit in local banks, while tribal funds are generally deposited in the United States Treasury. I have been very insistent that the funds of western South Dakota Indians should, wherever possible, be deposited in western South Dakota banks. Thus the Indians receive higher interest rates and the deposits assist in the development of the country. Those bank deposits now total nearly a million and a quarter dollars, scattered through more than 40 cities and towns in South Dakota west of the Missouri River. With the further sale of Indian estate property many other depositories will be designated.

REIMBURSABLE ISSUANCE OF LIVE STOCK.

On several of the Sioux reservations the Indian Service has on time payments provided Indians with cattle. This is separate and apart from any regular issue of live stock, for the sale is made much as transactions are made in everyday business. The system has been found to work very well. Many Indians have been benefited by it. Its operation should be broadened until every Indian who is trying to obtain a start in life and who will take care of the cattle is supplied unto his needs.

GRAZING LEASE PAYMENTS ON PINE RIDGE RESERVATION.

The Indians on Pine Ridge Reservation last year complained of the delay in making grazing lease payments. War conditions, with the incidental raise in the price of beef, made pasture more valuable, and great portions of Pine Ridge Reservation never before leased were taken by stockmen. Many hundreds of new leases were made and the force at the agency for the time being found itself unable to keep pace with this work. New regulations have been issued by Supt. Tidwell, with the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, providing that all adult allottees shall themselves collect grazing lease payments due them on and after April 1, 1920, where the amount involved does not exceed $200 per annum. Under these regulations over half of the leases of the reservation will be paid direct, the Indian Service will be relieved of the work of handling the payments, and the Indians will promptly get their money. This change will be watched with interest, for if it proves beneficial—as undoubtedly it will—its use will spread to other reservations.

HIGHWAY DEVELOPMENT.

Lack of good highways has retarded the development of localities where Indian lands predominate. To meet that situation on Standing Rock Reservation there was appropriated in 1916 $5,000 for road construction. Later, in 1919, $25,000 was appropriated and a similar amount in 1920. Under these appropriations Indians are usually employed to do the work.

Continuing that policy, a $25,000 highway appropriation was made this year for Pine Ridge Reservation, where much unorganized territory presents a serious highway problem. The House agreed to $10,000 for roads on Cheyenne Reservation, but this item was defeated in the Senate. The Indians will be the gainers by a definite highway policy of construction and maintenance through Indian country, not only in their convenience, but also in the increased value of their land resulting from better roads.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CHEYENNE.

The Cheyenne River is the south boundary of Cheyenne River Reservation. From the southwest corner of the reservation to where the river empties into the Missouri is at least 75 miles in an air line, and a great deal farther when the meandering course of the river is considered. There is not a bridge in that distance. In fact, there is no bridge across the Cheyenne from Wasta to the mouth of the river, approximately 150 miles. The unopened portion of the reservation borders the river, hence the Indians would profit by the building of a bridge, in that it would open to through travel a region now quite inaccessible. Realizing the necessity for a bridge, and believing the cost thereof should be prorated, I took up the question with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and with the chairman of the South Dakota Highway Commission. It was agreed that a bridge should be erected, the definite location to be determined by proper officials, two-thirds of the cost to be taken care of by the highway commission and one-third by an Indian-fund appropriation. The House provided $40,000 for this purpose, but the Senate cut it to $25,000, which amount was finally agreed to. Fearing this might not be sufficient to pay one-third of the cost of a bridge, I interrogated the chairman of the House Indian Committee regarding a supplemental appropriation, and Senator STERLING also interrogated the chairman of the Senate committee, each receiving an affirmative assurance. I hope the building of this bridge may be hastened, for it will be another step in western South Dakota development, which will mean much to both Indians and whites.

COMPETENCY OF FARMERS, INDIAN SERVICE.

To be eligible for employment as farmer in the Indian Service, a man must now not only pass the civil-service examination but must also have a certificate of competency from the president or dean of the agricultural college either of the State in which his services are to be rendered or of an adjoining State. The necessity for this requirement is to make certain that a farmer will be thoroughly familiar with the problems and conditions of his district, for otherwise a man may be sent to a position where he has no knowledge of the local conditions because the civil-service examination is general in character.

INDIAN BOARDING SCHOOLS.

I venture the remark that the average citizen who is familiar with the expense of sending a young man or young lady away to school will be wonderfully surprised at the low per capita cost of the Government Indian boarding schools. The maximum permitted by law used to be $166, but rising costs of food, fuel, and clothing made it necessary to raise the limit to $200 for schools in excess of 100, and $225 where less than 100. Last year we further raised that limit to $225 with a provision if the school has less than 200 pupils $250 may be expended.

These schools are doing a great work, but, even so, a wider field is before them. Their courses embrace only eight grades, and at least in some of the schools a high-school course should be offered. Manual and vocational training should be strengthened wherever possible.

At the Rosebud Boarding School, at Mission, S. Dak., there will this year be constructed an addition to the dormitories which will increase the capacity from 200 to 250 pupils, additions to the school building and the dining hall, a home for employees, cottages for the school principal and the physician, an additional water supply, a gymnasium, a hog house, an implement shed, and a granary. The power and heating plant will be reconstructed. These improvements will cost approximately $100,000 and will not only increase the capacity but raise the efficiency of the school, which has 10 sections of good land and is excellently located.

At the Pine Ridge School improvements will consist of additions to the dormitories, schoolhouse, and dining hall, the construction of a home for employees, a gymnasium and an employee's cottage; the dairy barn, water system, and power plant will be repaired and improved. Approximately $100,000 will be expended for these purposes.

These improvements will be very beneficial to Rosebud and Pine Ridge Indians. In fact, all the people of those reservations will be benefited directly or indirectly from the resultant raising of the citizenship standard of the Indian children of to-day who will be the Indian men and women of to-morrow.

In the appropriation bill approved May 18, 1916, $30,000 was provided for a new school building at the Rapid City Indian School, inasmuch as the school had outgrown its building. Plans were prepared, but prices advanced, and when the bids were opened they were above the appropriation. Later an additional appropriation of $15,000 was secured and the building is now under construction. The superintendent will be able to add some money from other funds, sufficient to insure the completion of the building, which will include an assembly hall. Nine thousand dollars has been appropriated for remodeling buildings, it being the intention to convert the present schoolhouse into a kitchen and dining room and use for dormitory purposes the space in the boys' dormitory now occupied by the kitchen and dining room. Four thousand dollars was appropriated in 1917 for construction and maintenance of the road through the school farm and last year $3,000 was added to the repairs and improvement fund and the use thereof broadened to include the construction and repair of roads, which will from year to year assure the maintenance of an excellent road through the farm. Three thousand dollars was appropriated in 1917 for irrigation and drainage of the school farm and a similar amount was carried in the succeeding bill. With these improvement appropriations the Rapid City School has been liberally cared for. It is well located with respect to western South Dakota reservations; Indian parents like to send their children there and to visit them at Rapid City. That school will be needed as long as any non-reservation Indian school. Considerable of the tributary reservation territory is unorganized, with very sparse white settlements, hence it is quite helpful to the Indian children to have the experience of attending school at Rapid City. A manual training building is needed and should soon be provided for. The school farm has dry land and irrigated farming and fruit raising and an excellent dairy.

CHILDREN OF PATENT-IN-FEE INDIANS.

I frankly give my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the Indian Service should cease to be concerned about the property of the children of competent Indians to whom have been issued patents in fee. I do not mean to say that patents to the real property of those children should be issued to the parents, but I do assert that patents should be issued in the names of the children and they should cease to be under the jurisdiction of the Indian Service. At most, then, the parents could no more than receive the use of or the income from the land involved, and why not? They are charged with the care and maintenance of their children. The land could not be deeded away or mortgaged by either the father or the mother and the child could not transfer or encumber it until 21. Thus there is no fear of the property being taken from the children. The same laws and the same courts that would safeguard your children or mine in the possession of any property which might come to them before becoming of age would protect them. For one to claim those minors would not be adequately protected is to deny the integrity of the courts of South Dakota or any other State in which the Indians reside. Lands thus patented to minors should be nontaxable during their minority.

I recently asked a South Dakota Indian reservation superintendent as to the results if patents in fee were to be issued to every member of his tribe of less than one-half Indian blood, in accordance with the declaration of policy announced by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on April 17, 1917, and to other members of the tribe who are found to be competent and to the minor children of every Indian thus patented. He replied such a policy would reduce the work of any business coming before his office fully 60 per cent.

IN CONCLUSION.

I do not blame hundreds and hundreds of the Indians for growing restless at the continuation of governmental supervision. They are earning their daily bread and providing for their families. It is true some of them are not, but that equally applies to a percentage of whites and others the world over. For the opportunity they have had and considering their location and handicaps the Indians have done remarkably well. Their generous response during the recent war is a credit to their race. The Army, Navy, and Marine Corps numbered many thousands of Indian young men and stories of their deeds of bravery were brought back from the battle lines. They liberally purchased Liberty bonds and contributed to the Red Cross and other organizations of mercy. Let us take them by the hand and wish them Godspeed as they take the next steps along the pathway which leads to an enjoyment of fuller citizenship, and in the new day for them I believe they will measure up to their responsibilities.

Memorial Day Address Made by Hon. M. Clyde Kelly in Wilkinsburg, Pa., Monday, May 31, 1920.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the law of Pennsylvania makes Monday, May 31, a legal holiday whenever the 30th comes on Sunday. This year that gave the Pittsburgh district, including that great city of a million people, ample room and verge enough to do full honor to our Nation's heroes, of which that great city and its suburbs availed themselves by some 50 celebrations in those two days, concluding with a special parade of the allied veterans of all our wars to the great Memorial Hall erected in honor of the Grand Army of the Republic, where I had the high privilege of addressing several thousand people, almost a third of whom were veterans in uniform, on the afternoon of Monday, at the close of these stately ceremonies.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLY, spoke at six of these celebrations, including that at the suburb of Wilkinsburg, whose 20,000 people sent 2,000 to the European war, a record of patriotism and service not surpassed in the United States, and I had the honor of participating that morning in a slight degree in the tribute they paid their heroic sons. Very probably no orator in the United States took a more active and eloquent part in the Decoration Day celebration than our colleague, the Hon. M. CLYDE KELLY, and, in my opinion, the preservation of his address will be very much to the interests of the development of patriotism. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, under leave granted I am printing the address made on Memorial Day, 1920, at Wilkinsburg, Pa., by my colleague, Hon. M. CLYDE KELLY, of the thirtieth Pennsylvania congressional district.

THE ADDRESS OF REPRESENTATIVE KELLY.

Veterans of the wars of the Republic; men and women of America: This is a day of memory and of gratitude. While the Nation bends over the graves of its honored dead over here and sees in vision the crosses in the fields of honor over there, the tribute of love is paid to all.

We remember the Continentals who cemented the stones in the temple of independence with their blood; the men of Lake Erie and Cerro Gordo, who paid with their lives for the victory of America in 1812 and the War with Mexico; the Federals who died on a thousand battle fields that the old flag might float unsullied in the heavens, with not a single star lost; the warriors of 1898, who at San Juan Hill and Manila Bay were willing to die that justice and humanity might live.

On this Memorial Day the story of the Nation's life naturally centers in the history of the past two years. On May 30, 1918, one of the world's darkest hours was upon us. Civilization seemed prostrate before the Hun. Belgium was down in the blood and mire, a little strip 10 miles wide alone remaining subject to the sovereignty of that heroic nation. Not a foot of Serbia was left to her people, the Bulgarian and Austrian armies having full possession. Italy was fighting in the snows of her Alps and the mud of her Piave River, desperately struggling to keep back her powerful foes. Roumania was out of the battle line, the victim of treachery and ruthless might. Russia's giant strength had been turned against herself, and the Prussian army was unopposed as it marched forward. The British army had just been ordered to die, if necessary, with back to wall, since further retreat meant utter disaster. Valiant France, after four years of fighting, was being forced back and German shells fell daily in the streets of her beloved Paris.

May 30, 1918, darkness and almost despair! May 30, 1920, victory for the forces of freedom and defeat for German autocracy! Surely it is well to remember to-day the deeds that wrought the transformation; that turned the blackness into light, the disaster into triumph.

From Chateau-Thierry it was possible to speak of German defeat as certain. It proved that the Prussian military machine was overmatched and could be overthrown decisively.

And America turned the tide of battle in this decisive conflict. The soldiers from the great Republic, thrown into line just in the nick of time, held like a stone wall against the attacks of the picked troops of Prussia—held until the assaulting columns were broken and shattered, and then turned the defensive into an offensive with a thrust which nothing could withstand. On July 15 the German hosts were marching swiftly on Paris, flushed with victory. On July 18 they turned their faces away from Paris and headed for Berlin, and they never looked back from that time to the end.

The Germans had met the young troops of America, and the military machine which had been 50 years in building fell to pieces before the blows of a citizen army.

It is not an instance of American braggadocio to say that the Americans won this pivotal battle. No boasting of ours can equal the calm statements of our comrades in arms. Gen. Mangin, in his order of the day for August 7, said:

> You men of the Third American Army Corps threw yourselves into the battle like men going to a feast. Your magnificent dash surprised and upset the enemy and your indomitable tenacity stopped counter-attacks by his fresh divisions.

On August 9 Gen. Degoutte issued a general order, which I read, in the front lines on the Vesle River. He said:

> The American troops have played the most glorious part in the Second Battle of the Marne. Their glorious stages are marked by names which will be illustrious in the military history of the United States. * * * The magnificent results accomplished are due to the energy and ability of the officers and the bravery of the soldiers.

Lloyd-George, Gen. Diaz, and the leaders of all the allied armies vied with each other in their praise of the American troops in the great battle which decided the history of many future years.

I had the high good fortune of being an eyewitness of this battle during the days when the rival forces were fighting from Chateau-Thierry to the Vesle.

When we landed at Bordeaux there was discouragement and doubt everywhere evident. Old Frenchmen told us that Paris was doomed. "The Hun will destroy our beautiful capital," they said with tears in their eyes. A young officer whispered mysteriously to us that the trains had stopped taking persons to Paris. There was a portent of evil in the atmosphere, and men and women crowded silently around public places waiting for the communique from the front.

A few days later in Paris we found a marvelous transformation. Gloom had given way to joy, doubt to confidence, defeat to victory. That line of khaki along the Marne had held firm. British and French learned that by their sides were men from America who would not yield to any foe. They realized then that the millions of Americans available for the war meant that, no matter what happened, Germany could not win the ultimate triumph.

The people were wild with joy, and the Americans from Chateau-Thierry who walked along the Parisian streets were in danger of being smothered by the embraces of graceful French citizens. It was the sunlight after the darkness, and every man, woman, and child in France seemed new born in confidence.

On a bright, clear morning we started in an automobile for the fighting front. At 40 miles an hour we whirled over the splendid French road leading to Chateau-Thierry. This road ran straight as an arrow, and long lines of poplars border either side.

Soon we came to Meaux, the little city which marks the farthest point of the great German drive of September, 1914. It was a great flour center then, but now the mills were in ruins and many of the houses had been destroyed. Here was where the French poilu made his immortal stand and prevented the Prussians from ending the war in a single campaign.

From this point we traveled through war-scarred France. Everything seemed peaceful and quiet in the morning sun. Here and there along the road and working in the fields, clipping stalks of wheat around the shell holes, were women of France. They were garbed in black, and they neither smiled nor cried.

They knew more than we. They knew that over there the spire of an age-old church should point heavenward, but that instead it lay in a heap of wreck and rubbish. They knew that out in the fields were little groups of wooden crosses, which marked soldiers' graves. They knew the horrors of war, the crash of falling walls, and the death cries of little children.

You did not have to ask if these women had lost a father or husband or brother or son on the battle field. You knew that they had lost one of these or all in the struggle.

But you knew also that these women of France would not give up. As they toiled in the fields you saw all around them the little flowers which have come to have a symbolic meaning in this war. There were the crimson poppies, springing up in riotous profusion in the ruined fields. There were the blue cornflowers, blue as the skies of France. There were the white marguerites, humble but hardy. It was the tricolor of France carpeting the ground, and no Hun shell could root it up. The red and white and blue, planted by Almighty God, are the colors of America, too, floating over the armies as they go to battle for freedom. All the might of Germany, her engines of destruction and her ruthless disregard of humanity, could not suffice to blot those colors from the earth.

We rushed through Meaux and then kept north for miles. There were shell holes in the road, with groups of workmen repairing them so that traffic should not be stopped on this great highway. The poplars along the road had been thinned by shell fire, cut through as though with a pair of giant shears. In the fields were trenches, miles long, dug in anticipation of the last-ditch stand before Paris. Before the trenches were barbed-wire entanglements, hundreds of tons of this new war material being used for barring the way of the Hun.

Over in one of the fields we saw the wreck of a German airplane and a dozen feet from it the wooden cross which marked the grave of the pilot.

We reached Vaux, once a city, now a heap of stones and dust. This deserted town was the last word in desolation. It had been bombarded three times, twice by the Germans and once by the Americans. Vaux was taken by the Germans in their great offensive of March, 1918. They held to it like grim death, making its strong stone walls the shelter for their machine guns, which barked death against the Americans in their advance.

Finally it became necessary to destroy these nests, and orders were given our Artillery to demolish every building.

At Chaumont I had a long talk with Col. McClosky, of Pittsburgh, who commanded the brigade of Artillery to which the task was given. He told of laying high-explosive shells on every foot in the town. Not a house escaped, and for 13 hours a perfect rain of shells dropped on the doomed city.

Then 20 squads of infantrymen, each in command of a sergeant, were sent out to capture the machine gunners. Each leader was given a little sketch showing the location of the cellar where these gunners would likely be found hiding. Some 600 Germans were found cowering in the cellars, and they were brought back as prisoners, with the loss of but one American. Then the Americans advanced, with no one left to say them nay.

I saw Verdun and Belleville and a hundred other wrecked villages and cities of France. I saw no town so utterly destroyed as Vaux. Not a stone remained on another. All was chaos—a combination of the Johnstown flood, the San Francisco earthquake, and the Baltimore fire.

We went through this ruined city, where no human being dwelt. Then over to the left we saw the famed Belleau Wood, where the marines proved that the German is no superman but an ordinary individual who will run as fast as another when he is defeated.

Inspection of these woods made one feel like paying reverent tribute to the soldiers who could take them from an enemy and hold them. They were thick as a jungle brush. The shells had cut down trees and cleared some paths through them, but how men could force a passage against machine guns is a marvel.

I talked later with a young lieutenant who had won his commission by his bravery during that terrible fight. He said that his own company lost 7 men out of every 10. German machine guns had been placed in the trees and hailed down death on those below. Snipers, with green helmets and camouflaged uniforms, sat in the trees and picked off American soldiers.

But the marines overthrew the enemy there. In the future, on all the maps of France, this dark and bloody wilderness will not be marked as the Belleau Wood but as the Woods of the American Marine Corps. It is a tribute richly deserved, and the name will be hallowed in America.

We went on to Chateau-Thierry, and stopped to see the old palace set on a hill overlooking the Marne. This old chateau was built in 720 by Charles Martel, that same Hammer King who saved civilization from the Moslems at Tours. The chateau was taken by English archers in 1421 in the war which was ended by Joan of Arc, in her white armor, heading the French Army, in answer to her voice in the woods of Domremy. A hundred years later it witnessed a great battle between the French under Francis I and the army of the German Empire under Charles V.

Half a century more and the Spaniards took Chateau-Thierry in the course of the religious war between Henry of Navarre and the Medicis. In 1814 the old chateau saw Napoleon's army of 20,000 young soldiers smash an army of 50,000 representing an alliance of all Europe.

In 1,100 years the old chateau has never suffered such damage as that wrought in this last conflict. The wall and gates were wrecked and the old palace itself ruined beyond repair.

Inside the chateau I saw the results of the battle. The upper stories had been the target for the shells and had crumpled down in rubbish. In the cellar the German officers had planned for luxurious living. Fine tapestries and curtains had been collected from the upper rooms and hung here. On a table I saw many packages of the ornaments which had been taken from the chateau by the Germans. They had looted the old palace of its ornaments and valuables, and apparently each officer had collected a package for himself. There they were, all neatly addressed to relatives in Germany, to be sent back as trophies of the triumphal march on Paris.

I walked out on the plateau, where a hand-to-hand battle raged. German rifles, helmets, bayonets, and ammunition were scattered about in profusion. There were two machine guns, in perfect condition, and thousands of rounds of ammunition left behind by the flying Dutchmen. Everywhere were marks of the desperate struggle—bloody clothing, broken implements of war. Nothing had been moved, but a few days later the American Salvage Corps had cleaned the place of all its débris.

In one corner of the plateau I found many graves, each with its wooden cross giving the name and number of the soldier. Side by side were German, American, and French dead. On one of the German crosses I read, "Here lies Lieut. Reitenrodt, from Bingen on the Rhine." I thought of that little poem we used to read in our school readers, of the soldier of the legion, dying in Algiers, who came from Bingen, fair Bingen on the Rhine.

At his side lay an American soldier, dead on the field of battle. Both of these soldiers had given their lives. They had paid the highest price possible, their lives. But what a difference after all. The lieutenant from Bingen died for the dream of his Kaiser, a conquest lustful despot, who desired to rule the world.

The American, too, died for a dream. Not the dream of a Kaiser or Czar or King, but the dream of a free people, who hoped to make the world free. Aye, more than that, for a dream of the Babe of Bethlehem, star guarded, that in the times to come brotherhood of man should be more than an empty phrase, and in very truth there should come "Peace on earth, good will to men."

On this very spot, where enemies lay so peacefully sleeping, I picked up a German bayonet, symbol of the necessity of this war, and came back to the automobile which waited for us.

On we went past wheat fields which were literally plowed up by the shells. Here and there an unexploded 6-inch shell peeped up out of the ground, a sinister warning of the dangers to be encountered when men begin again to plow these fields. Past woods we went, stripped clear by shell fire.

On the ground, in wicker baskets, were shells of every description. There were hundreds of thousands of them piled along the way. Methodically arranged, the piles extended for miles along the roads. Here and there were dumps ready for the batteries. The Germans had made their plans with their usual care. One of the mightiest offensives of the entire war had been planned and the Hun had confidently counted on going into Paris.

But the best laid plans "of mice and men and bosne oft gang astray." The Germans had counted on almost every possible contingency. They had their camps in the woods, their printed signs for directions, their hospitals, and their supplies. They had counted on everything but the American soldier. And that one mistake caused the downfall of all their hopes.

The immense stores of ammunition fell into the hands of the Americans and they promptly turned it against the enemy. They used German guns and German ammunition and worked havoc with them. I remember that a lieutenant of our Artillery, in firing these shells, would once in a while remove the fuse before putting the shell into the gun. I asked him why he did it. He replied, "Every once in a while I throw over one of these duds to let the Hun know we are using his own ammunition."

We kept on and soon the road was filled with marching men and huge camions filled with supplies, all bound for the front. The regiments swung along the roads, moving with the stride of men who have absolute confidence in their strength and fitness. Their faces were bronzed and weather beaten and they all looked magnificently strong and healthy. The very sight of these young warriors was enough to put new heart into the weary soldiers of France and England, who watched them pass.

Among the Infantry regiments were batteries of artillery, with here and there a "heavy" loaded on a truck. The machine gun battalions were there, their little carts having an odd appearance, but at the same time holding a sinister menace to the enemy.

The truck kitchens were in their places, and the hot rations were served out as the boys tramped along. We waved greetings to these boys and they responded with quick smiles and cheers when they heard us speak in English. We learned that this particular force was a division made up of Ohio and Illinois lads bound for the fighting zone.

Thus far we had been beyond the range of any but the largest guns and the Germans were not wasting tons of shells on the remote chance of hitting an encampment or disabling horses and destroying trucks.

But a few miles farther on the scene changed. We passed one of our batteries and it was in action, the guns roaring as the 6-inch shells sailed out to the German lines. If I had not heard these guns I could not have found them, although they were only a few yards away. A screen of grass and leaves concealed the guns completely and it took a close inspection to find a few inches of the muzzle peering out. Behind the guns, covered with turf and shadowed by trees, were the dugouts of the gunners. On a little mound sat an observer with field glasses, scanning the sky for airplanes. At the first sign of a plane or the drone of an engine far away, he would whistle and every man in the battery would dive into his hole like a rabbit for its burrow. They would stay there until the lookout whistled "all clear." An enemy airplane might have descended and the aviator searched for an hour without finding this battery, but as we went by it was making the earth shake with the discharge of the guns.

Another mile, and the enemy shells, shrapnel, and high explosives began falling around us. The screech-bang of the shrapnel was a peculiar sound. They whistled through the air and then exploded with a crash about 50 feet in the air. The sound of the German shells was alternated with the "bang-screech" of our own shrapnel as our shells went singing across to the German front.

Here a military police, autocrat of the roads, ordered us to stop the automobile, as it could go no farther. No one, not even Gen. Pershing, dared disobey one of these regulators of traffic. So we meekly crawled out of the automobile and started to walk ahead. Around the corner we found a dressing station, crowded with wounded soldiers. Two medical officers and a dozen privates handled the cases with efficiency and dispatch. Wounds of every kind were displayed—some slight, some very serious. The medicos gauged them all with practiced eye and hand, administered the antitetanus solution, arranged the bandages, and passed the wounded soldiers back to the ambulances to be sent to the hospitals behind the lines.

It was wonderful to see the spirit of these young Americans, bleeding from the wounds of battle. One, with a frightful wound in his thigh, smoked a cigarette as he predicted a speedy return to the line. One lad had a piece of shrapnel through his hand which left only a strip of flesh between thumb and forefinger. He held it out to the medico, and said, "It don't amount to a ———, Doc. Just wrap it up and let me get back to my outfit."

We went on down the road. Woods lined both sides, and for half a mile the Thirty-seventh Ohio troops were stretched along the bank, each man in a hole which had been dug with his trench tool. They were waiting for orders to "go over the top," which were to come after the Artillery had cleared the way. Not one of these boys was excited, and many of them were sound asleep in their burrows, utterly oblivious to the rain of shells all around and the tremendous noise which marked their explosion.

One of the boys rose up from his hole in the mud as we passed by. He was very short in stature, but we saw that he wore the bars of a captain, and the boys around him seemed to pay him the respect due a real man. He pointed ahead to a ridge where the German artillery was located and from which the shells were coming.

"See that ridge?" he asked. "Yes," I answered; "that's the German line, isn't it?" "It sure is," he responded, "and we're going to drive the Boche out of there at 6 o'clock to-night, and my boys and I will have the first sound sleep for 10 nights." He spoke as confidently as though he announced his intention to attend a concert, in the days of peace, back home. We wished him and his company luck and went on down the line.

The little captain was right. At exactly 6 o'clock the Americans took that ridge, and another step in the great battle had been won. But the captain went down with a bullet in his brain just as he entered the woods. Half his company went down with him, never to rise again, the blood of these dyeing the poppies a still deeper crimson.

Their sleep was sound as they lay out there under the stars. God rest them and all the brave ones like them who paid the last full measure of devotion for their country and a noble cause.

We asked the boys as we went along where the One hundred and eleventh Infantry, composed largely of Pittsburghers, was located. They did not know, except that they believed that they were still farther up front and to the right.

Finally, we had passed all the Infantry and still found no sign of the One hundred and eleventh Regiment. But we were in a position where both our own and the German shells were making a carpet above our heads. We dodged into the woods and kept to the right. It was amazing what satisfaction there was in having leaves between you and breaking shrapnel. The leaves were no better than tissue paper, but the shade made you feel safer, and there is a great deal in that, after all.

A hundred yards through the woods and we came to Chateau de la Foret, a one-time splendid mansion, but which had been wrecked an hour before by shells. The yard was filled with fragments of wagons, dead horses, and broken boxes of medical supplies. The chateau had been used as an advanced temporary hospital, but the German batteries had found it and destroyed it, killing several wounded soldiers.

We talked to a Red Cross man, who still stayed to attend two badly wounded Americans, and he told us that the One hundred and eleventh Regiment had been moved far over to the right, and it would be impossible to find them during the day.

He said that he would take us out to a cliff where we could see the plan of battle, and we started out with him. Shells were bursting all around, and as we came nearer the German lines we could hear the rat-tat-tat of the German machine guns. The bullets came clipping through the leaves overhead, but none came near us.

We burst through a clot of underbrush, and ahead was a scene which I shall never forget—an American soldier, seated with his back against a tree, his rifle across his knees; around him seven other Americans, all crumpled down on the ground. Fourteen dead Germans were there and two black French Moroccan soldiers, the blood of all mingling in a single stream.

One of the Americans seemed to have wished to tell any observer of this gory scene that he was the last survivor, for he had stuck his bayonet into the ground and his rifle stood there, as though he would say, "I was the last to go. They all died before me."

Every man engaged in that little wave of the great battle had died in the combat. The grass was green and soft and the leaves rippled overhead. But there on the ground were eight of America's bravest sons, who never again would feel or hear or see. They were part of the host who paid the price for freedom and who with their lives made victory possible.

O valiant hearts, who to your glory came Through dust of conflict and through battle flame,
Tranquil you lie, your knightly valor proved.
Your memory hallowed in the land you loved.

Proudly you gathered, rank on rank, to war,
As those who heard God's message from afar;
All you had hoped for, all you had, you gave
To save mankind, yourself you scorned to save.

Splendid you passed, the great surrender made,
Into the light that nevermore shall fade.
Deep your contentment in that blest abode
Who wait the last clear trumpet call of God.

We left the dead and went on to the cliff of which the Red Cross officer had spoken. Down at our feet lay the town of Sergy, occupied by the Germans. From windows here and there spurted streams of machine-gun bullets, and once in a while a concealed "heavy" would throw a shell toward the American lines. Behind the town was a ridge of wooded hills being fortified against future assault. As we watched a big shell from an American gun struck fair in one of the houses of the little town. There was a crash and the house was no more than a heap of dust and rubbish. It was simply blotted out of existence, and if it sheltered any Germans, they never worked harm again.

The Red Cross man now hurried us back, for he said there was danger of being shelled by our own guns, as a barrage would soon begin on the German line and this town.

We cut through the woods, back past the Chateau de la Foret and then the waiting infantrymen. As we went back we found our batteries lined up for action, guns wheel to wheel. Down the whole side of the woods ran the guns. We waited to see the barrage begin. "Load as fast as possible; fire," came the order down the line, and the response was immediate. A flash ran down those guns and crash blended into crash until the very earth rocked. Up and down the fire wave ran and the shells poured over in a stream. The Germans responded with a new activity, but there was not the slightest let-up by the Americans.

When I went back a few days later, I saw the result of that bombardment. Sergy was utterly destroyed, and the Germans had been driven out of it and back miles beyond it. Sergy had changed hands several times in one day, but it was now American, to stay in our hands until the French could begin the work of its rebuilding.

We finally got back to our headquarters safely but I had not found the regiment I desired to see. A week later we made another sally up to the front line, this time many miles farther advanced than before. We went through Sergy and then north toward Fere en Tardenois and the Vesle River. Everywhere were marks of terrible battle. The woods had been used by the Germans for their camps, and signboards were everywhere in evidence.

We saw here the signs of the diabolical devices used by the Germans in their retreat. Our soldiers had to face not only the continual rear-guard action, but every yard of the conquered ground held its own dangers.

Dugouts were screened by branches to which wires were attached. When the branches were lifted, mines were exploded. Shovels and picks were left sticking apparently at random in the ground. But when they were picked up, explosions followed. Loose boards of stairs in houses, when stepped on, set off explosives.

Then there were mines laid on the roads, and when a heavy truck passed over, it exploded a detonating cap which set off a score of great shells, blowing to fragments anyone above.

Many of our boys met their fate through these devilish tricks of a shameless enemy. It was necessary to send scouts out ahead of the troops to protect them from this most dishonorable warfare. After seeing some of this fiendish work I could appreciate the remark of one officer we met who said, "We don't take any prisoners. Any Boche we get is through."

By the time we reached Fere the shells were making music all around us. We drove into the town and up to a hospital outfit located in a cellar. The captain took us back into an underground passage where several privates of the Medical Corps were stretched out asleep, after working 18 hours without rest, attending to the wounded.

I put my old question about the One hundred and eleventh Regiment, and this time got the definite answer I wanted. "They are down the road about 4 kilometers," a private in the group spoke up. "It's pretty dangerous, for the Boche is shelling the road. Put on your gas masks, for he's sending over gas lately."

We got our gas masks ready and set out down the road.

On either side were the wrecks of houses which had been struck with shells within the past hour. A little further on we saw the charred remains of German tent hospitals, with a few iron standards showing here and there. Over yonder was a burned hangar, where German flying machines had been kept. Everything possible was burned as the Germans fled from the Americans.

We passed several ambulances loaded with wounded soldiers, the drivers rushing on without paying the slightest attention to the exploding shells.

We trudged through the dust for a mile more and then came around a corner of the road and looked down the first line of Americans, the fighters in the very front. Right ahead of us was a good-sized dugout tunneled into the bank and walled around with stones. It was the advanced dressing station of the One hundred and eleventh Regiment.

"Well, look who's here," yelled a voice, and I was seized and pulled into the shelter. It was First Lieut. Bolger, of the Medical Corps, a lifelong friend. I was successful at last in reaching the long-sought goal.

Lieut. Bolger told me the news. The boys had been in the fray since the first week of July. He himself had not had his clothes off during that time. He had been in the front all that time and had dressed the wounds of thousands of boys who had been wounded in the battle.

Finally, I asked him about the boys and he took me outside and pointed down the road. There they were, 500 and more strong, each man in his little dugout, burrowed into the bank at the side of the road. Overhead the shapnel shells were bursting, but the boys paid no heed.

We started down past that line of grinning Americans, and I seemed to be back in God's country. Everybody seemed to know me and I seemed to know everybody. Some of the boys I had started out selling newspapers 15 years before. The parents of many of them were my good friends, and in a short time we were all at home together.

Curiously enough, after first asking about relatives back home, the boys wanted to know about the war. It is a fact that the nearer you got to the front the less you knew about the actual happenings of the war at large. When an offensive was on, papers did not get through for days, and the only sources of information open to the soldiers were the rumors which spread everywhere and the dry official announcements. I told them about the Italian front and the British drive along the Belgian front, and they listened eagerly.

Col. Shannon, who commanded the regiment, had his headquarters in the very center of the line, and we set out to pay our respects to him. As we went along the boys shouted greetings. "This is hotter than Pittsburgh," yelled one. "What do you think of the Hun orchestra?" said another. Every young soldier had a smile that showed that there was no fear behind it. It was the American spirit in lads who knew they were more than a match for the best troops Germany could send against them. In the pink of physical condition, they gloried in their strength and waited impatiently for the hour when they could go over the top again for another combat with the enemy. They were not braggarts, but from Chateau-Thierry to this point they had met the German and made him run from every conflict, and they knew they could do it again.

I looked over that line of boys stretched there in the road, most of them quiet, modest fellows, coming from good homes. They were not rowdy swashbucklers, bringing terror by their appearance, but they were veterans who had smashed the famous Prussian Guards. They were part of the greatest fighting force in the world.

For 30 days these lads had been advancing against a hail of shell fire and machine-gun bullets. Here is an actual picture of what these boys faced, drawn from an official report:

Imagine a long line of these soldiers stretched flat in open fields and on roads, exposed to the rack and torture of an intense German shell fire. The order goes down the line that at 2.30 the American attack is to be made. The objective of the attack is a strip of woods about a mile away, which shelters machine-gun nests. At 2.10 the Artillery starts a rolling barrage, sweeping the ground 50 yards every three minutes. At 2.30 the boys leap to their feet, advancing in three lines. The German fire swells to a terrible intensity, and that field becomes a pit of war where veterans are made.

The edge of the woods is reached at 3.35. The barrage makes its final leap forward over the woods and the shells make a curtain to prevent reinforcements coming up. The "doughboys" jump for the machine guns in the face of a stream of bullets. After an hour of hand-to-hand fighting, clubbed rifles, bayonet thrusts, even blows with the fist, the Americans hold the position. They have captured every machine gun, and not a gunner is left who is not dead or a prisoner.

The Americans consolidate the position. At 7 o'clock there is a violent counter attack, which is beaten off. The next morning the Americans are ready for another advance on the next position.

That is the way the Americans advanced from Chateau-Thierry to Fismes. For more than 30 days it was a continual conflict against shrapnel, high explosives, gas, machine guns. Snipers were plentiful, located in the trees, with camouflaged helmets and uniforms, striving to pick off Americans. I saw one of them who had been camouflaged as a stump. He would never be camouflaged again.

As we approached the colonel's headquarters in the line, we were met by a captain, who escorted us to the spot. It was no palatial mansion where this officer dwelt. Instead, it was a deep hole in the ground and in it sat Col. Shannon, with a board across his knees, on which he wrote his orders. A telephone line ran out from this hole to the captains of companies on the right and left. Another wire stretched back a mile to the headquarters of the general in command of the division.

The colonel got out of his office, when he saw us, and shook hands eagerly, saying it was a delight to see civilian clothing. He had not slept for 24 hours and there were dark circles under his eyes, but the eyes were flashing with unconquerable purpose. He explained that Company I and another were over to the right and that there would be a big push forward by the regiment in a short time.

While we talked a private came up with supplies for one of the advanced companies, saluted, and started over a little elevation toward his destination. He had not gone 50 yards when a shell made a direct hit fair in his breast, killing him instantly. Two privates rushed out into that path of danger, carried the body back, and in five minutes it had been buried in a grave scooped out for the purpose. A cross was placed above it, with the name and number of the soldier, and its location was marked on a map, so that the spot could be identified in the future.

The colonel had a world of grief in his eyes as he watched the burial. "My poor lads," he murmured, "they are paying the price."

When I asked him for a message for the parents back home, he said, "Tell them that the boys are magnificent Americans."

Then I told him that I hoped he would wear the star of the brigadier general as the reward of his splendid work. He looked at me with scarcely a smile at the compliment. "What I get don't count, Congressman," he said; "it's what the German gets that counts, and we are here to give it to him."

Soon the colonel crawled back into his hole in the ground and the last I saw of him he was writing furiously, with the board on his knees as a writing desk.

We walked up the line and every lad in khaki shouted his word of cheer. They showed us souvenirs of every kind. One lad gave me an airplane dart which had been thrown down that morning from an airplane a mile in the air. They had German buttons, iron crosses, bayonets, and a hundred mementos of the fights through which they had gone.

One private, Horace Scott, dived into his dugout and came back with a German automatic revolver, known as the Luger. It was in perfect order and looked as though it had never been fired. He requested me to carry it home to R. W. Edmunds, a merchant in my home city, and then later to turn it over to his father. I agreed to carry out his commission and threw the strap of the pistol over my shoulder.

Every American soldier seemed to be a souvenir collector. They carried one souvenir until they found a better one, throwing away the old treasure for the new. One German prisoner said, "We Germans fight because we are driven. These Americans fight for souvenirs."

We left the boys at the extreme end of the line and came back down toward the dressing station. Before we had come within 200 yards of it there was a terrific drone in the sky overhead. The sound worked wonders in the road. Before there were a hundred lads out in front of their dugouts chattering like magpies. After that drone in the sky you could look down the line and not see a sign of a dugout dweller.

I looked up into the sky and when I saw what was coming I confess that I wasted no time in diving head first into a hole beside a young American private. For there in the blue heavens, coming on at tremendous speed, were four German airplanes bound directly for our line in the road. As the fliers approached, they were greeted with a tremendous outburst of shrapnel fire. Then the antiaircraft guns let loose and added to the clamor. The machine guns were turned on the planes and some of the boys stuck their heads out from shelter and took a pot shot for luck with their own rifles.

But these airplanes came on as though flying through snowflakes. They struck the end of our line, turned abruptly, and flew directly overhead, turning their machine guns against the line of dugouts. Everybody was hugging the bank and no one was hurt. One flier threw out a bomb, which, luckily, landed some 50 yards away in a field. When it exploded it seemed to shake the earth.

The planes were flying at an altitude of about 1,500 feet and we could see the head of the pilot plainly. When they sailed back to the German lines I thought the experience was over. But they came back again and raked the ground with their machine guns. When they finally went back the experience was still not over. In five minutes the German artillery had an increased activity and the shells began falling still closer. The fliers had signaled our position and the guns were registering on the road.

By the time we had reached the first-aid dressing station in the line the German gunners had found a crossroads a hundred yards away and they registered a hit on every yard. The officers told us that the gunners were getting the location so they could shell it at night in the hope of catching bodies of troops on their way up to the front.

While I was talking to Pvt. Carr, of the Medical Corps, a shrapnel broke just overhead. One fragment struck him fair on the helmet and dropped down to the ground. It was red hot, but we rolled it in the mud and it became another souvenir.

While we waited for the shell storm to blow over the medical officers paid tribute to the spirit of Americanism. They said that that very morning seven lads had been brought in wounded. Hospital tags were pinned on them, and they were told to wait for the ambulance which was to take them to the hospital. But each of the seven lads tore off the tag, and the next discovered of them was their presence in the front line waiting to go over the top.

While we sat there a new noise shattered the air. It sounded like a Fourth of July celebration, with more cannon firecrackers than ever went off together. We learned afterwards that a German shell had struck one of our ammunition dumps and some thousand pounds of explosives had gone up in one grand outbreak.

We decided to make a try to get around the crossroad, which was still being shelled. As we left our own guns opened their booming challenge to the enemy and began the barrage under which the boys were to advance to the objective point.

We zigzagged our way out, and beyond the crossroads looked back for a last look. The sky was a network of shells, both German and American. Down in their dugouts were the Americans ready for the dash over the top, and they went out to that assault like men going to a festival.

Over they went into a living hell, which they knew by dear experience. But they were anxious for another assault and to keep assaulting until victory was won.

Words are barren things in describing the deeds of these lads with their boyish smiles and their dauntless hearts. Through San Mihiel and the Argonne Forest they drove with invincible courage, and in the end the Prussian power bowed, conquered, before them and their comrades in arms.

The German Kaiser dreamed of Der Tag, and it came. He sat on the hill crest, clad in shining armor and watched his millions go by. He saw the eagles of his army glistening above a myriad host. He saw his guns go rumbling on by thousands and heard the tramp of countless horses' hoofs.

He saw villages blotted out and cities destroyed. He saw age-old churches and cathedrals tumble into heaps of dust. He saw men mutilated, women defiled, children starved. He saw great vessels sent to the bottom of the ocean by his stilettoes of the seas, while women and babies went down to watery graves. He saw the world wallowing in a bloody mire as his armies resistlessly advanced over a score of prostrate lands.

With blasphemous heart the Kaiser gloated over the gory waste and declared he would be master of the world. He said that other world conquerors had erred—that Alexander, Cæsar, and Napoleon had made mistakes, which he would correct. He boasted that he would change the history of the world.

But he was woefully wrong. One thing in history he could not change, and that is the record of 144 years that never has the Stars and Stripes of America been lowered in defeat to any foe.

After Der Tag came The Day. The German Emperor saw his gilded vision shattered by an army in khaki. He saw his famed Prussian Guard break against an invincible line and retreat in rout and disorder. He saw his armies shattered, his generals outwitted.

He saw his allies break away in utter despair. Bulgaria, Turkey, and Austria followed each other out of the unholy alliance, with prayers for mercy. He saw a steel ring around the Empire, welded by the men of Pershing and Haig and Foch and Diaz and other leaders of the forces of freedom. He saw the revolt of his duped subjects, who had paid with oceans of blood for his burning lust for power. He saw the ruin of his proud kingdom, even as he fled from the land which he had so often proclaimed was his own possession from the hand of the Almighty.

Der Tag belonged to Germany. The Day is America's. Today when we remember with tears and sorrow the price paid that it might be so, we may also be proud and joyous that it is so.

Here and now we should highly resolve that this price shall not have been paid in vain. That is the flaming challenge to us. We dare not fail to make sure of victory, indeed, the destruction of autocracy wherever it may lift its serpent head.

We owe undying obligations to the living soldiers—those who returned from battle field and camp, from battleships and transports and destroyers. They staked their lives for America and they deserve the help of every red-blooded American in making their victory real.

I believe that they recognize that when they were mustered out of the A. E. F. they were mustered into the A. C. F.—the American Citizenship Force. William Hervey Allen, a Pittsburgh boy and one of my constituents, who won the awards of honor on the fields of Flanders, has written a poem interpreting the feeling of the soldiers of the Republic, old and young.

We who have come back from the war,
And stand upright and draw full breath,
Seek boldly what life holds in store
And eat its whole fruit, rind and core,
Ere yet we enter through the door
To keep our rendezvous with death.

We who have walked with death in France,
When all the world with death was rife,
Who came through all that devils' dance,
When life was but a circumstance,
A sniper's whim, a bullet's glance,
We have a rendezvous with life!

With life that hurtles like a spark
From stricken steel where anvils chime,
That leaps the space from dark to dark,
A blinding, blazing, flaming arc,
As clean as fire, and frank and stark—
White life that lives while there is time.

Deliver us from tactless kin,
And drooling bores that start "reforms,"
And unctuous folks that prate of sin,
And theorists without a chin,
And politicians out to win,
And generals in uniforms.

We have come back who broke the line
The hard Hun held by bomb and knife.
All but the blind can read the sign;
This time is ours by right divine,
Who drank with death in blood-red wine—
We have a rendezvous with life!

Friends, you who are part of this great Pittsburgh district, the workshop of the world, have especial obligation, in view of the marvelous record made in the years just ended. Never in all the world's history was a greater exhibition of unity and cooperation in the advancement of a great cause than that of this district during the Great War.

This Pittsburgh district poured out its possessions in the Republic's peril to give power to the arm of Uncle Sam. She placed on the altar of America $650,000,000 for Government loans and war funds. She gladly gave up $2,700 for every home within her limits to sustain the Stars and Stripes in time of storm and stress. She quadrupled the quotas requested but which did not gauge her generosity. She paid taxes of $200,000,000 during two years, a larger sum than the entire North paid during two years of Civil War. She called on her numberless nationalities to rally for the Nation's relief and they responded with splendid readiness to give until it hurt. She built a bridge of brotherhood out of her garnered gold on which the forces of freedom might march on their mission for God and home and native land.

The Pittsburgh district forged the steel for guns and shells and armor plate and ships. She beat plowshares into swords and pruning hooks into spears for piercing the Prussian power. She produced from mine and mill the essential weapons for warfare. She spun barbed wire for entanglements; fabricated automobiles for the motor transport; made grenades for hand-to-hand combat; built freight cars for the service of supply in France; turned the workshop of the world into a workshop for the war against Kaiserism. Her riveters punched holes in the German U-boats. Her machinists used their skill to help dismantle the military machine of Prussia. Her workers put pessimism into internment camp for the war. Her army of industry silenced the base brood of pacifists, defeatists, and friends of the Kaiser in old-fashioned, red-blooded American style. Her toilers had put the "work or fight" order into operation before it was commanded by the War Department. She had her heatless, meatless, wheatless days—and grinned.

The Pittsburgh district sent forth 50,000 fighting men to strike her blow for freedom. She gave her sons to be the iron in the Iron Division, the Twenty-eighth. She furnished the backbone for the Eightieth Division. She raised the Fifteenth Engineers, whose practical efficiency made the Allies exult. She sent men to 130 different Army camps, to be trained in every branch of military service. She enrolled infantrymen, cavalrymen, artillerymen, aviators, marines, seamen, gunners. She provided men for the tanks and motor transport; Medical Corps and Signal Corps; battleships and submarines. Her sons met the spearhead of the Hun attack on Paris in those dark July days when France thanked God for the hosts of salvation. Her warriors sent the glad news around the globe that the Boche could be beaten. Her fighters started victory on the march and the watch on the Rhine into an alarm clock. Her soldier boys went from Chateau-Thierry to Fismes, from San Mihiel through the Argonne Woods. Her lusty lads helped to float the flag over Egreinbreitstein, the Gibraltar of William the Last.

The Pittsburgh district gave men who won awards of homage and honor from America and every allied nation. Her victorious veterans wear the Croix de Guerre, the medal of the Legion of Honor, the Victoria Cross, the Order of Leopold of Belgium, the distinguished-service cross and medal, the war awards of Serbia, Italy, Greece, Roumania. She proved that she could breed brave men whose spirit is superior to every device of scientific savagery. She had men who brought back the days of knighthood and with chivalric courage defended humanity, destroyed despotism, and in the name of freedom slew the monster of their time.

The Pittsburgh district paid in precious lives for her desire for democracy. Her dead sleep to-day in every field of honor in all the battle zones. Her homes contain sacrificial shrines wherein there gleam the stars of gold. Her sons fairly flung life away for the world's need; they had power to die that the truth might live. They put their heart's blood into the fabric of the flag in order that all men might be as free as Old Glory, the emblem of the free. They brightened the blue of it with their bravery; the white became fairer through their faithfulness; the red shines more radiant through their renown. They went into the Valley of the Shadow unafraid and lay down to sleep in the little green tents in Flanders fields. She asks now from war, its most priceless treasure, the ashes of her dead. She desires them to rest at last in the arms of America, where, under the changing clouds and changeless stars, they may rest in peace until the Master gathers them out of the camps of death into the mansions prepared for those who show the greatest love in the world, that of laying down life for fellow men.

The Pittsburgh district had holiday when the boys marched off to war, and with cheers and tears told them to see the grim business through. She blessed them all, rich boy and poor boy, college graduate and apprentice lad alike. She bade them fight, not to enslave but to free, not to destroy but to save, not for conquest but for conscience. She sent with them her own helpers in Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., Knights of Columbus, Jewish Welfare Service, Salvation Army, and all the branches of soldiers' welfare work. She welcomed the homing heroes back again to the land of stars and sunshine when they had done her bidding and it was over "over there." She gloried in the joy of those who came back to longing mothers and waiting wives and eager children and the girls they loved. She took them back into office and store and mine and mill and church and college. She urged them to organize the American Legion and to hold fast to the lessons learned on the grim fields of the world's greatest war. She was great enough to produce heroes and she is great enough to show her gratitude and to keep their memory green.

The Pittsburgh district will keep faith with her own. She will derive profit herself from the discipline of war by doing with dynamic power the thing that needs be done. She will strive for the unity of patriotic purpose which she achieved in the shadow of peril. She will understand better the curse of caste and the crime of putting pedigree above living principle. She will make sure that no traitorous force shall ever triumph. She will help to see that no man, however powerful, may flout the law of the people's will. She will help send alien revolutionists to the lands from which they came and native profiteers to prison. She will know the virtue and virility of the religion of the common good—the great cause of the world. She will value ideals more highly, with faith that right must vanquish force and fraud in the end. She will stand for one country and one flag—and in the end for one language. She will be true to the living and the dead of the Great War; to those who sleep under the waves and under the flowers; to those whose valor and virtue make every patriot heart throb and thrill with pride; to the laureled soldiers of America, one and all, whose devotion to justice and democracy made a rainbow of peace which, pray God, shall span and overarch the clouds of war in all the years to come.

In the words of Pittsburgh's soldier-poet, William Hervey Allen, we may face the future unafraid, confident that, amid all her smoke and grime, the soul of Pittsburgh is unsullied and spotless as she "builds the roads for the bannered march of crowned humanity."

Soldier Allen is everlastingly right when he sings:

Pittsburgh, your name is on the whole world's lips,
For many nations toil within your gorge.
Stately by day with swan-like river ships,
At midnight lurid with the flaming forge.

And merchants bargain keenly in your mart,
Old earth has bled her veins to give you coal,
Gold in your purse and steel about your heart,
City, oh, city, what of your soul?

Son, it is well. You do not know my soul.
It lives a glorious thing beneath my smoke.
It is the spirit of the folk who toil,
Radiant as molten iron and glowing coke.

Men have not known me yet in all my might.
I laugh to hear the ribald spendthrift names.
Such pass like meteors across the night,
While I, in deeds miraculous, remain.

My feet are rooted in these deathless hills;
I watch the witches' caldron slowly boil.
You hear the awful thunder of my mills.
But I the prayer and curse of them that toil.

Son, it is well. For I am sound at heart.
River and lake and rail shall bring me spoil,
And time, the torch of learning and of art,
To light the workshop of the sons of toil.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD YATES,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to print in the RECORD the following remarks of my colleague, Hon. WILLIAM B. MCKINLEY, of Illinois:

"With 435 Members of Congress, coming from every corner of the United States, representing varied and conflicting interests, it is impossible, upon the floor of the House, in open sessions of Congress, to compile the wording of a complex law. For that reason committees are formed. The membership of these committees varies from 5 to 25. An important measure like the bonus bill is presented to Congress. It is referred by the Speaker to an appropriate committee with instructions to prepare and submit a properly drawn bill to Congress. The committee, as has the Ways and Means Committee in this case, considers the matter for weeks—hearing many witnesses and working over many statistics. With the aid of experts, the committee at last completes a bill which it presents to Congress. The bill, like the bonus bill now before us, does not in all the clauses suit all the committee, but is a compromise of different opinions—a give and take of 25 minds.

"So now with this bonus bill. I recognize the right of the soldier to additional compensation, and I voted for the bill. I consider the insurance proposition admirable and hope that is the plan a majority of the men will accept. The home-buying feature is fairly good. The cash payments are so strung out that I fear they will be of small benefit to the recipients. I fear the arid-land scheme, called a farm-creating plan, will prove of little worth to the soldier and a waste of money to the Government. Perhaps the Senate may improve this plan so that farms may be bought in settled farming communities, in order that the soldier will not be compelled to leave his friends and relatives and go into an unsettled country to build up a home.

"No one wants to pay additional taxes, and, of course, all affected will object. In order that the farmer may have a fixed market price for his grain, which he must deliver in the winter months, there must be grain exchanges where corn, wheat, and oats will be contracted for months ahead and prices established. I think the placing of a heavy tax upon these sales brings a direct burden upon the consumer of food and is unwise. Food products are too high already and legislation should be enacted to reduce rather than increase the cost. For the same reason I think the tax laid upon railroads and street car companies is wrong, as it must immediately be passed on to the general public just the same as the retail sales tax, which was eliminated from the bill.

"In voting for the bill I recognized it was the best that the committee could agree upon. I know at the present time it can not be changed upon the floor of the House, and I hope some of the defects I have pointed out will be corrected in the Senate.

"If I may digress for a moment, I should like to call attention to some rather startling facts regarding the cost of our Government and the relative cost of wars which we have fought.

"According to the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury the World War, during the actual period of fighting, from April, 1917, to November, 1918, cost the United States, in round figures, $33,000,000,000. The interest on this alone is greater than the entire cost of our Government for any one year up to 1916.

"This amount does not include the tax which we propose to levy for the bonus now under consideration, a tax which properly may be included in the World War cost; it does not include money spent incident to the war since armistice day 1918. I do not think I overstate the matter when I say that the Treasury's figures probably are $10,000,000,000 less than the actual cost of the war to this country.

"Contrast this stupendous total with the cost of other wars.

"The Revolution, through which we won our independence, cost $80,000,000. War costs were low in those days. Seven years' battling against Great Britain a century and a half ago cost us less than seven days' fighting against Germany in the summer of 1918.

"The War of 1812 cost about $130,000,000. That with Mexico in 1848 cost only $63,000,000; and that with Spain less than $500,000,000.

"The Civil War—the greatest of modern conflicts until the outbreak of the World War—cost but $3,500,000,000, although we have added to that total since by our worthy pension system.

"There are other costs which ought to be taken into consideration. The civil branches of our Government used the war to extend their activities for war purposes in all directions. Now, with the war over, they have been inclined to continue on the same scale. Fortunately, our appropriating committees called a halt, or I can not venture a guess as to where they would have drawn us in the financial pit."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE M. YOUNG,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to an article prepared by Mrs. Elizabeth Preston Anderson in reply to a statement made by Samuel Gompers upon the subject of "Beer and Workers."

Mrs. Anderson has long been a prominent leader in the prohibition movement in North Dakota and also in the Nation, and I am sure many of the Members of Congress will be glad to read her article. It was printed in the North Dakota White Ribbon Bulletin and reads as follows:

MRS. ANDERSON'S REPLY TO MR. GOMPERS.

(Mrs. Anderson's reply to Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, is so full of convincing arguments that we feel that it should have the widest circulation.—Ed.)

The Forum of May 17 publishes an article on "Beer and workers" by Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor. Were it not for his official position, the article would attract very little attention, especially in a State where prohibition has been the settled policy for nearly three decades.

One who did not know how prohibition had been won in this country would gather from reading the article that it had been in some way forced upon the majority of the people against their will. He says, "I wish to say that I consider the foisting of prohibition upon this country against the palpable wish of the large mass of the people to be worse than a crime; it is a blunder."

He speaks of the immigrants from the lands of middle Europe and their descendants, who have always been accustomed to the use of wine and beer; that though they are voters, they have had no voice in the passage of this law; of their wonderment that though they are citizens and have a voice in the government of their country, yet their voice in this is unheeded and that they know their voice is in the majority!

Mr. Gompers ought to know that 35 out of the 48 States of the Nation have passed prohibitory laws for their separate Commonwealths. In 18 of these States prohibition has been put into the constitution by the direct vote of the people, and every citizen who had a vote had a voice in it. In 16 other States the legislators elected by the voters have placed a prohibition law upon the statutes. The citizens of the District of Columbia are the only ones who have not had a voice in passing the prohibition law under which they live.

The Federal amendment for national prohibition was passed by Congress, notwithstanding the tremendous efforts of a powerful, unscrupulous pro-German lobby, with almost unlimited money at their command, because Congressmen knew that it was the demand of an overwhelming number of their constituents, and they dared not ignore it.

The Federal prohibition amendment had in Congress the solid vote of 24 States; it had a majority vote of 12 States; in 4 of these States only one vote against it. Seven States were divided evenly; only four divided adversely to prohibition; and only one State voted solidly against it.

The world was startled at the rapidity with which the State legislatures ratified the prohibition amendment. But few State legislatures met in 1918, but of these 15 ratified. Most of the State legislatures met in 1919, and 29 of these ratified before the end of January. Forty-five State legislatures, or nine above the required three-fourths, have ratified.

There is only one explanation possible, and that is that the legislators knew there was an overwhelming demand for prohibition of the liquor traffic on the part of their constituents. These 45 States represent a population of 100,380,546. Their legislators cast 5,365 votes for the amendment and 1,223 against it.

Mr. Gompers says one thing with which I heartily agree, namely, "Total abstinence, like law and order and government, is a gradual growth born of the desire, first as individuals and then of peoples, to grow." He evidently has been blind to the growth of total abstinence and the idea of the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

The temperance reform in this country has been a slow process of growth which has extended over a period of more than 100 years. The temperance reformers 100 years ago took the position Mr. Gompers takes to-day. The first pledges were against drunkenness, not against drinking. In the earliest temperance societies in this country men were fined every time they became intoxicated, but did not forfeit membership.

After years of attempting to mitigate this evil the settled conviction grew that total abstinence on the part of the individual and prohibition on the part of the State were the only effective methods of dealing with the poison of alcohol in whatever form it might be.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union, organized in 1874 as a result of the crusade of 1873 and 1874, that "whirlwind of the Lord" as it was called, was, I think, the first temperance organization to stress the work along educational lines. The children were organized into loyal temperance legions and taught. Through the efforts of this organization a temperance lesson was put into the Sunday school lesson series. After years of indefatigable labor they succeeded in securing in every State the passage of laws providing for the teaching of scientific temperance in the public schools in connection with physiology and hygiene.

The children of yesterday are the voters of to-day. They are intelligent on this question because they have been trained in the Loyal Temperance Legion; they have been taught in the Sunday school what the gospel says, and in the public schools the dicta of science as to the effect of alcohol on the body and brain. When we remember this we cease to wonder at what some papers characterized the "indecent haste" with which the legislatures of the States ratified the prohibition amendment. This great movement has been a gradual growth; it has a solid foundation under it.

Mr. Gompers seems to fear that prohibition will make the laboring man an easy prey to the I. W. W. and bolshevik agitator. His statement that "there are more nondrinking union workmen in the United States to-day than I have ever known in all my life, and the number of total abstainers is growing," is an answer to this. Thirty-five States have prohibition, yet we have not heard of laboring men anywhere striking or rioting because they can not get their beer. The "no beer, no work" agitation is a part of the pro-German brewers' propaganda and has been repudiated by many labor unions.

When Mr. Gompers appeared in Washington on December 17, 1917, the day the House concurred with the Senate in submitting the amendment, he made an appeal on the ground that labor was opposed to it, but was careful to explain that he did not speak for the National Federation. If labor was opposed to prohibition, would not the National Federation have taken action against it long before this?

On April 7 the prohibition State of Michigan voted on a proposition to legalize the sale of wine and beer. It was defeated by a majority of 203,936.

Mr. Gompers points to Russia as an example of prohibition. It must not be forgotten that the revolution in Russia, accomplished under prohibition, was a bloodless one, and it was only after the vodka shops were opened that Russia went down into the depths.

North Dakota has had nearly 30 years of prohibition. When the law was passed liquor men predicted that prohibition would discourage immigration, decrease the population, kill business, increase taxes, retard growth of larger towns—especially those on the Minnesota border—build up large cities across the line at North Dakota's expense and make the State poverty stricken. It is interesting to consider these objections after nearly 30 years of prohibition.

Discourage immigration. To-day 35 per cent of the population are foreign born.

Decrease the population. The population in 1890 was 190,983; in 1917 it was 692,000, an increase of 246 per cent.

Kill business. While North Dakota is an agricultural and not a manufacturing State, yet according to the United States census for 1910 the average number of wage earners increased in 10 years 105 per cent. The value of goods produced increased in the same time 205 per cent. The value of farm products increased in the same decade 211 per cent; the value of live stock, 155 per cent; the value of crops, 234 per cent. This percentage of increase was not exceeded by any other State in the Union. During the year 1913 this State led every State in railway construction.

Increase taxes. The tax on $1,000 of actual value in 1913 was 90 cents. The same year in Minnesota the tax on $1,000 of actual value was $2.12; Montana, $1.20; Idaho, $1.61; Iowa, $2.45; Nebraska, $1.25; Michigan, $2.25; Indiana, $4.

Retard growth of cities, especially those on the border. The increase of urban population in North Dakota from 1890 to 1910 was 494 per cent. For the same period the increase in South Dakota, under license, was 168 per cent. Fargo, North Dakota's largest city, had in 1910 a population of 14,600; in 1917, 23,000, an increase of 57 per cent in seven years. Moorhead, just across the Red River, in Minnesota, which at one time was larger than Fargo, and which had enjoyed the benefits (?) of saloons until the fall of 1915, has a population of 5,000. The population of Grand Forks, N. Dak., is about five times that of East Grand Forks, Minn. The population of Wahpeton, N. Dak., is nearly twice that of Breckenridge, Minn.

Make the State poverty stricken. The agricultural wealth of North Dakota exceeds the agricultural wealth of the six New England States combined, and, with the exception of Texas, exceeds in value any of the 16 Southern States, all of which, except Delaware and Florida, have more than three times North Dakota's population. The total wealth of the State increased from $337,006,506 in 1890 to $1,973,616,540 in 1917. Under prohibition the State has multiplied its wealth nearly six times

North Dakota has no saloons, but it has a bank for every 767 inhabitants. In 15 years, from 1898 to 1913, the bank deposits increased more than 1,000 per cent. No State in the Union exceeded this percentage of increase. The per capita bank deposit in 1913 was $138. In 1917, according to figures compiled by the State commissioner of agriculture and labor, it was $235.95. Has any license State nearly doubled its per capita bank deposit in four years? The per capita wealth in 1917 was $2,981. Eighty per cent of the people of the State own their homes.

In 1917 there were 62,994 automobiles registered in the State; this is one for every ten and a fraction of the population.

When the North Dakota National Guard, the One hundred and sixty-fourth Infantry, went to Camp Greene, N. C., a prominent attorney of Charlotte, N. C., wrote to the father of one of these boys that the town, at first apprehensive of the coming of these troops from the wild and wooly West, was astonished at the quiet sobriety, self-restraint, splendid character, and gentlemanly deportment of the young men. North Dakota points with pride to her sober, cool, clear-eyed, strong soldiers, born and brought up in an atmosphere untainted by the saloon, as of infinitely greater value than all her wealth and prosperity and as an unanswerable argument for prohibition.

We believe if Mr. Gompers lives to see the United States under prohibition for 10 years he will testify to its tremendous value to the laboring man and to all the people of this great country.

President Wilson's Memorial Day Address Yesterday at Suresnes Cemetery Near Paris.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHAMP CLARK,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 31, 1919.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include President Wilson's Memorial Day address yesterday at Suresnes Cemetery, near Paris, in France.

The address is as follows:

MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS BY WOODROW WILSON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, AT SURESNES CEMETERY, FRANCE, MAY 30, 1919.

Mr. Ambassador, ladies and gentlemen, fellow countrymen, no one with a heart in his breast, no American, no lover of humanity, can stand in the presence of these graves without the most profound emotion. These men who lie here are men of unique breed. Their like has not been seen since the far days of crusades. Never before have men crossed the seas to a foreign land to fight for a cause of humanity which they did not pretend was particularly their own but knew was the cause of humanity and of mankind. And when they came they found comrades for their courage and their devotion. They found armies of liberty already in the field—men who, though they had gone through three years of fiery trial, seemed only to be just discovering, not for a moment losing, the high temper of the great affair, men seasoned in the bloody service of liberty. Joining hands with these, the men of America gave that greatest of all gifts, the gift of life and the gift of spirit.

THEIR COURAGE AND ARDOR.

It will always be a treasured memory on the part of those who knew and loved these men that the testimony of everybody who saw them in the field of action was their unflinching courage, their ardor to the point of audacity, their full consciousness of the high cause they had come to serve, and their constant vision of the issue. It is delightful to learn from those who saw these men fight and saw them waiting in the trenches for the summons to the fight that they had a thought of the spirit as well as a physical might, and those of us who know and love America know that they were discovering to the whole world the true spirit and devotion to their motherland. It was America who came in the person of these men and who will forever be grateful that she was so represented.

SLEEPING WITH KINDRED SPIRITS.

And it is the more delightful to entertain these thoughts because we know that these men, though buried in a foreign land, are not buried in an alien soil. They are at home, sleeping with the spirits of those who thought the same thoughts and entertained the same aspirations. The noble women of Suresnes have given evidence of the loving sense with which they received these dead as their own, for they have cared for their graves, they have made it their interest, their loving interest, to see that there was no hour of neglect, and that constantly through all the months that have gone by the mothers at home should know that there were mothers here who remembered and honored their dead.

You have just heard in the beautiful letter from M. Clemenceau what I believe to be the real message of France to us on a day like this, a message of genuine comradeship, a message of genuine sympathy, and I have no doubt that if our British comrades were here they would speak in the same spirit and in the same language. For the beauty of this war is that it has brought a new partnership and a new comradeship and a new understanding into the field of the effort of the Nation.

LESSON TAUGHT BY THE DEAD.

But it would be no profit to us to eulogize these illustrious dead if we did not take to heart the lesson which they have taught us. They are dead; they have done their utmost to show their devotion to a great cause, and they have left us to see to it that that cause shall not be betrayed, whether in war or peace. It is our privilege and our high duty to consecrate ourselves afresh on a day like this to the objects for which they fought. It is not necessary that I should rehearse to you what these objects were. These men did not come across the sea merely to defeat Germany and her associated powers in the war. They came to defeat forever the things for which the Central Powers stood, the sort of power they meant to assert in the world, the arrogant, selfish domination which they meant to establish, and they came, moreover, to see to it that there should never be a war like this again. It is for us, particularly for us who are civilized, to use our proper weapons of counsel and agreement to see to it that there never is such a war again. The nation that should now fling out of this common concord of counsel would betray the human race.

So it is our duty to take and maintain the safeguards which will see to it that the mothers of America and the mothers of France and England and Italy and Belgium and all other suffering nations should never be called upon for this sacrifice again. This can be done. It must be done, and it will be done. The things that these men left us, though they did not in their councils conceive it, is the great instrument which we have just erected in the League of Nations. The League of Nations is the covenant of governments that these men shall not have died in vain. I like to think that the dust of those sons of America who were privileged to be buried in their mother country will mingle with the dust of the men who fought for the preservation of the Union, and that, as those men gave their lives in order that America might be united, these men have given their lives in order that the world might be united. Those men gave their lives in order to secure the freedom of mankind, and I look forward to an age when it will be just as impossible to regret the results of their labor as it is now impossible to regret the result of the labor of those men who fought for the union of the States. I look for the time when every man who now puts his counsel against the united service of mankind under the League of Nations will be just as ashamed of it as if he now regretted the union of the States.

OLD STANDARDS SURGING FORTH.

You are aware, as I am aware, that the airs of an older day are beginning to stir again, that the standards of an old order are trying to assert themselves again. There is here and there an attempt to insert into the counsel of statesmen the old reckoning of selfishness and bargaining and national advantage which were the roots of this war, and any man who counsels these things advocates a renewal of the sacrifice which these men have made; for if this is not the final battle for right there will be another that will be final. Let these gentlemen who suppose that it is possible for them to accomplish this return to an order of which we are ashamed and that we are ready to forget realize they can not accomplish it. The peoples of the world are awake, and the peoples of the world are in the saddle. Private counsels of statesmen can not now and can not hereafter determine the destinies of nations. If we are not the servants of the opinion of mankind, we are of all men the littlest, the most contemptible, the least gifted with vision. If we do not know courage, we can not accomplish our purpose, and this age is an age which looks forward, not backward; which rejects the standard of national selfishness that once governed the counsels of nations and demands that they shall give way to a new order of things in which only the questions will be, "Is it right?" "Is it just?" "Is it in the interest of mankind?"

STATESMEN UNITED FOR LEAGUE.

This is a challenge that no previous generation ever dared to give ear to. So many things have happened so fast in the last four years that I do not think many of us realize what it is that has happened. Think how impossible it would have been to get a body of responsible statesmen seriously to entertain the idea of the organization of a league of nations four years ago! And think of the change that has taken place! I was told before I came to France that there would be confusion of counsels about this thing, and I found unity of counsel. I was told that there would be opposition, and I found union of action. I found the statesmen with whom I was about to deal united in the idea that we must have a league of nations; that we could not merely make a peace settlement and then leave it to make itself effectual, but that we must conceive some common organization by which we should give our common faith that this peace would be maintained and the conclusions at which we had arrived should be made as secure as the united counsels of all the great nations that fought against Germany could make them. We have listened to the challenge, and that is the proof that there shall never be a war like this again.

Ladies and gentlemen, we all believe, I hope, that the spirits of these men are not buried with their bones. Their spirits live. I hope—I believe—that their spirits are present with us at this hour. I hope that I feel the compulsion of their presence. I hope that I realize the significance of their presence. Think, soldiers, of those comrades of yours who are gone. If they were here, what would they say? They would not remember what you are talking about to-day. They would remember America, which they left with their high hope and purpose. They would remember the terrible field of battle. They would remember what they constantly recalled in times of danger, what they had come for, and how worth while it was to give their lives for it. And they would say, "Forget all the little circumstances of the day. Be ashamed of the jealousies that divide you. We command you in the name of those who, like ourselves, have died to bring the counsels of men together, and we remind you what America said she was born for. She was born, she said, to show mankind the way to liberty. She was born to make this great gift a common gift. She was born to show men the way of experience by which they might realize this gift and maintain it, and we abjure you in the name of all the great traditions of America to make yourselves soldiers now once for all in this common cause, where we need wear no uniform except the uniform of the heart, clothing ourselves with the principles of right, and saying to me everywhere, 'You are our brothers,' and we invite you into the comradeship of liberty and of peace.'" Let us go away hearing these unspoken mandates of our dead comrades.

HIS PERSONAL CONSECRATION.

If I may speak a personal word, I beg you to realize the compulsion that I myself feel that I am under. By the Constitution of our great country, I was the Commander in Chief of these men. I advised the Congress to declare that a state of war existed. I sent these lads over here to die. Shall I—can I—ever speak a word of counsel which is inconsistent with the assurances I gave them when they came over? It is inconceivable. There is something better, if possible, that a man can give than his life, and that is his living spirit to a service that is not easy, to resist counsels that are hard to resist, to stand against purposes that are difficult to stand against, and to say, "Here I stand, consecrated in spirit of the men who were once my comrades, and who are now gone, and who left me under eternal bonds of fidelity."

Democratic Achievements and Republican Failures.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY T. RAINEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the present session of Congress ends to-day. The Republican Party for 15 months has controlled both Houses of this Congress, and has back of it a record of broken promises and a record of failures without a parallel in the history of political parties in the United States. The Democratic Party has back of it during the period of its recent supremacy a record of achievement without a parallel in the history of nations. I desire to call attention to the following Democratic achievements in the recent past:

The income tax.

The Federal Reserve System.

These two measures made possible the financing and the winning of the World War.

Publicity of campaign expenses.

Under this law a United States Senator was recently indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary.

This law also made possible the investigations now in progress in the Senate which have already disclosed in a Republican primary election a total expenditure of moneys amounting to nearly $3,000,000. Much of it evidently spent corruptly and, as some of the evidence discloses, expended in buying delegates.

The eight-hour day.

Safety appliances on railroads and mines.

Workmen's compensation act.

Farm-loan banks.

This law makes possible for the first time the financing of the great business of farming.

Federal aid for good roads.

Soldiers' compensation laws.

War-risk insurance.

Pensions for soldiers of all our wars.

The Department of Labor established.

The Department of Commerce established.

The nonpartisan Tariff Commission act.

The Federal Trade Commission.

Legislation which made possible our merchant marine.

Legislation which has now made us the second fighting power on the seas, and which will soon make us the strongest on the seas of all the nations.

The Democratic Party also drafted and enacted into law all the numerous war measures which made possible our organization for war, the financing of the same, and its successful prosecution.

REPUBLICAN ACHIEVEMENTS.

Defeated the League of Nations.

Failed to act on President's suggestions with reference to reducing the cost of living.

The Republican Party has passed through the House bills to increase the cost of the following, to wit: Clothing, home building, education, food.

These bills are all pending now in the Senate, and the Senate leaders have announced they do not propose to pass them.

CLOTHING.

The Republican Party in this Congress has passed bills to increase the cost of dyestuffs and bills to increase the cost of pearl buttons. The bills are now pending in the Senate.

HOME BUILDING.

The Republican Party has passed through the House bills to increase the cost of tungsten, magnesite, and zinc. (Magnesite is a material out of which furnaces in which metals are smelted and made.) All these are raw materials for the steel industry, and higher prices will be quickly reflected in the building industry.

EDUCATION.

The Republican Party in this Congress has passed through the lower House a bill to increase the cost of chemical glassware. The principal use for chemical glassware is in our colleges, and the increase in the tariff on chemical glassware means an increase in the cost of the education of students who are taking this course of $20 per year. Students pay for their own chemical glassware.

FOOD.

The Republican Party in this House has passed through the House a bill to increase the tax on potato flour, a new industry. Potato flour is a bread improver. About one-tenth potato flour mixed with the remainder of wheat flour will make better bread than we now get and cheaper bread. Potato flour has been made abroad for some time, but is a new industry in this country, hence the attempt to increase its cost. The Republican Party has passed through the House a bill repealing our reciprocity act with Canada. This affected only foodstuffs, and was advocated by the Taft administration.

BEANS.

The Republican Ways and Means Committee has just reported out a bill increasing the tariff on edible beans 400 per cent.

Of course, none of these bills increasing the cost of living have passed the Senate, and it was not intended that any of them should pass the Senate until after the elections. They are intended to show tariff profiteers and tariff beneficiaries that the Republican Party is still on the job and is still looking after them. They do not dare, however, to enact any of them into law, even if they could be passed over a presidential veto, before the elections this fall. The elections might be unfavorably influenced thereby; but after the elections there still remains a very short session of Congress in which it may be possible to try to enact some of these destructive measures into law.

UNFOUNDED CHARGE AGAINST PRESIDENT.

A partisan Republican in a sensational speech intended to furnish campaign material charged on the floor that the President had received hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of presents while abroad. Investigation showed all presents to be of small value. The aggregate value will probably not exceed $700 or $800. Presents mostly consisted of keys to cities, presented on copper plates, linen handkerchiefs, addresses of welcome engrossed on parchment, and so forth.

PRAYERS FOR PEACE PROHIBITED.

Soon after convening our present Congress the Chaplain of the House of Representatives, a blind northern soldier of the Civil War, who lost his eyesight in battle, prayed for peace and the League of Nations. After the prayer and before he left the Capitol the Republican Speaker, who comes from Massachusetts, sent for the blind Chaplain and disciplined him and charged him with making a political prayer.

A PARTISAN REPUBLICAN ADMIRAL HAS JUST "BEGUN TO FIGHT."

Admiral Sims, who never figured in any battle in his life, and who was not even on a war vessel during the war, and whose only battles were fought over the dinner tables of England, has been induced by a partisan Republican Senator to belittle the Army and Navy of the United States before a Republican senatorial committee in order to discredit the Democratic Party. According to Sims, we accomplished nothing either on land or sea during the period of the war.

REPUBLICAN PARTISAN INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

A committee, known as the Graham Committee, and other committees, at an expense of approximately $2,000,000, employing one attorney who received a compensation at the rate of $20,000 a year, has, after a year's investigation of war activities, announced that an invisible committee was engaged for nearly a year before the war in preparing the great constructive measures which were quickly passed after war was declared, and which made possible the quick mobilization of all of our resources; in other words, the Republican Party during the war denounced Democrats for unpreparedness and have now proven that we were prepared in the manner above suggested.

REPUBLICAN LEGISLATION UNDER RULES WHICH PREVENTED AMENDMENTS AND PREVENTED DEBATE.

THE RAILROAD BILL.

This bill was prepared in secret caucus of the Republican Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The public was not advised as to its contents. Newspapers and magazine writers were given no opportunity to find out what it was until it was brought out of committee suddenly through a rule. It passed through the House after a brief debate and through the Senate. It became a law before the people knew what it meant. It made possible enormous freight and passenger increases in the near future; opened up a pipe line between the Treasury of the United States and the railroads of the country, which in the near future will absorb over $1,000,000,000; and it meets with the approval of neither railroad owners, railroad employees, nor the public.

THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Practically all the time of the present Republican Congress has been occupied by 67 committees investigating the Democratic management of the war, hoping to find material which would be evidence of fraud out of which a national Republican campaign could be conducted. The investigations have miserably failed. Finally, out of a clear sky, came a rule under which a resolution was forced through the House turning thousands of pages of testimony over to the Attorney General, in effect, with this declaration: "Read this evidence, find somebody to prosecute if you can. We are unable to suggest any evidence of fraud on the part of the Democrats in their control of our immense war expenditures." These investigations not only took up all the time of the Members of this Congress, but cost over $2,000,000 of the taxpayers' money.

THE SOLDIERS' BONUS BILL.

This was an attempt to influence the soldiers' vote and at the same time placate the taxpayers. It will please neither. It is a gold brick to soldiers and operates to alarm taxpayers as no other taxing measure has been able to do. They forced this through under a rule which would not permit amendments and which would not permit a motion to recommit in an effort to keep the Democrats from offering an amendment to tax war profiteers rather than to tax the food products of the country and the small income taxpayers. The bill, however, was not passed until the last few days of the session, too late to pass the Senate. Even if it passed the Senate, its provisions would not go into force for over a year. Soldiers will find out in the near future that they have been handed a gold brick of the most pronounced character. It can never become a law.

INCREASE OF PAY FOR POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

This is another measure brought in under a rule and forced through the House without an opportunity to amend it and without any debate. It is, however, wholly inadequate. Many classes of these faithful employees are entitled to much more money than they will receive, and the bill would have been amended to give them an adequate wage if an opportunity had been given to amend it. This measure will cost during the next fiscal year $34,000,000, and four years from now it will cost the country $45,000,000. This very large amount, if properly distributed and adjusted, might have been satisfactory. However, there was no opportunity to amend. Members of Congress were practically disfranchised and were compelled to either vote for the measure or to vote against it. It was the best we could get. Most of the Democrats voted for it.

Luhring's Record as a Congressman.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OSCAR R. LUHRING,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. LUHRING. Mr. Speaker, I shall take advantage of the consent given me to extend my remarks on legislation I have supported and work that I have done in this Congress, because I believe that the people, especially the people of the first district of Indiana, the district I have the honor to represent, are entitled to know something about the doings of their Representative in the Congress, so that they may determine whether or not he has been faithful to the trust conferred upon him, and whether or not he merits their continued confidence and support.

The present Congress was called in special session on the 19th day of May, 1919, and has been in almost continuous session since that time. At the very outset we were called upon to place upon the statute books in 38 legislative days seven great supply bills a Democratic Congress had failed to enact in more than three months of the preceding session, and so well was this work done that the American people were saved about $940,000,000 as compared with the Democratic bills that failed and $1,685,000,000 as compared with the sums of the estimates for those bills as submitted by the Democratic administration. It was my privilege to assist in the passage of this legislation.

Many important laws have been enacted during this Congress and much constructive legislation accomplished. The resolution for the woman's suffrage amendment was passed and now lacks but the vote of one State to make its ratification complete. I voted for that resolution. Next came the repeal of the daylight saving law, a law that had become obnoxious to the farmers of the Nation. This was speedily accomplished, and when the veto came the bill was passed notwithstanding the objections of the President, and is now a law. I voted to repeal. Then came the return of the telephone and telegraph wires to their private owners. I voted for that measure and thereby aided in bringing another war power to an end.

In addition to the matters just mentioned, I voted for and helped to pass the following and more important general legislation:

The incorporation of the American Legion.

Amendment to the war-risk insurance act increasing the allowance in certain classes of serious injury.

The enactment of liberal provisions for vocational training and rehabilitation of wounded soldiers and sailors; and generous appropriations for the same.

The extension and enlargement of the food-control act, with a view of preventing hoarding and profiteering, and with additional penalties for the violation of the statute.

Creation of office of General of the Armies of the United States in terms providing for the appointment of John J. Pershing to that office.

Provision for punishment for the transportation of stolen motor vehicles.

The Sweet bill, amending the war-risk insurance act, with the view of increasing the efficiency of the bureau and greatly liberalizing the provisions of the act in the payment of compensation to disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines.

The railroad bill: A complete and comprehensive measure for the return of the railroads to their owners and for effective and extended public control over the same. One of the most important pieces of constructive legislation ever considered by Congress.

A prohibition enforcement act carrying out the mandate of the Constitution.

An act authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment and road-making material to various departments of the Government and for the use of the States.

The Fuller bill, providing for increase of Civil War pensions.

I also voted for the budget bill, providing a comprehensive plan for a complete and thorough budget system for the Government of the United States.

Also for the Sells bill, providing for increase in Spanish War pensions.

Also for the postal employees' increase-pay bill.

Also for the Fess bill, providing for Federal aid to and cooperation with the States in the vocational training and rehabilitation of those injured in industry, including agriculture and transportaton, an important and noteworthy legislation proposal in the interest of humanity and for the restoration of unfortunates to lives of hope and usefulness.

I also voted for the resolution declaring peace with Germany and Austria and repealing all war-time legislation, and when this resolution was vetoed by the President I voted for a resolution to repeal the war-time laws and again place the country on a normal and peace-time basis.

In matters of interest and concern to labor, the report of the American Federation of Labor shows that out of a total of 14 votes cast by me 13 were favorable and met with the approval of that great organization. I have always been a friend of labor.

A detailed discussion of my work in committee is impossible here, and I will only attempt a brief reference. I was one of a special committee appointed by the Speaker to investigate the right of Victor L. Berger, the noted Wisconsin Socialist, to a seat in the House, and took an active part in the work, both in committee and on the floor of the House.

In addition to this special committee, I was a member of the standing Committees on Revision of Laws, Flood Control, Mines and Mining, and Elections No. 1, each of which considered matters of importance to the whole country. As a member of the Committee on Flood Control, I reported for passage my own bill for a preliminary survey of the Wabash River, with a view to the control of its floods, thus taking the first and necessary step in securing the aid of the Federal Government in a matter of vital importance to the landowners and tenants of the Wabash Valley.

The very next day after my election to Congress, and long before I took the oath of office, my duties began and continued to multiply until to-day I can boast of having had as varied an experience as any Member of the House of Representatives. I have been truly a representative of the people of the first congressional district of Indiana, acting as their lawyer, their collector, their agent, their friend and adviser in innumerable transactions with the State, War, and Navy Departments, the Pension and War Risk Insurance Bureaus, the Departments of Agriculture and Interior, and in a number of instances with citizens of Washington.

The very first work I was called upon to do was to obtain discharges of young men from the service, and in this I was very successful, because the grounds for discharge were such as were recognized by the regulations of the War and Navy Departments. In most cases I personally assisted the dependent parents and relatives in the preparation of the proper applications, so that no delay was experienced in having the matters considered and the discharge granted. In this work I had the supreme satisfaction of making many a mother happy, and I may be pardoned the reference when I say that my success in this matter became generally known among the "boys," and that I received appeals for assistance from all parts of the country. This work continued long after the armistice and with most gratifying success.

Next came the work of collecting the $60 bonus, and the additional travel pay, amounting to hundreds of dollars, and if any service man in my district failed to receive the amount justly due him on these accounts I have not heard of him. I was kept busy for several months handling applications and discharges and in sending the Government checks in payment of the amounts due.

Perhaps the most important work I have had to do for the ex-service men was the handling of claims in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance arising out of compensation, allotments, and insurance. These required personal attention, and I want to say right here that I challenge the statement that lawyers ought not to be sent to Congress, for had it not been for my training and experience as a lawyer I would have failed in a number of cases to have obtained the relief to which the claimant was justly entitled. I recall the case of one Gilbert L. Young, of Boonville, Ind., who had been accepted and enrolled in the Army, and after serving a few months was discharged on account of active pulmonary tuberculosis. His discharge stated that the disease or disability existed prior to his entrance into the service, and because of that his application for compensation was rejected. I successfully contended that under the Sweet law Young, having been examined, accepted, and enrolled for service, must be held and taken to have been in sound condition and, therefore, entitled to compensation. He received back pay from the date of his discharge, amounting to approximately $1,700, and a disability rating entitling him to $40 per month.

Cases of unpaid allotments were of frequent occurrence and demanded constant attention. In most cases it happened that the allotment was deducted from the soldier's pay, but had not been received by the allottee, and in a few the soldier, although exempted from compulsory allotment, sought to be reimbursed for money erroneously deducted from his pay. Happily most, if not all, allotment cases were satisfactorily adjusted.

My dealings with the insurance section of the War Risk Insurance Bureau were most interesting and had to do in the main with lapses because of failure to pay premiums. In each instance I was able to present the proper premium receipt and thus reinstate the policy and collect the insurance. In one case the soldier had enlisted under an assumed name and was killed in the service. He left two minor children who were under the law entitled to the proceeds of a $10,000 policy. I was able to establish the identity of the soldier as their father and to collect the insurance for them.

My work for the ex-service man and his family has been the source of a great deal of pleasure to me, and judging from the numerous letters I have received expressing their thanks and appreciation, highly satisfactory to them. The following letter, received from Mr. T. Morton McDonald, post adjutant, Princeton Post No. 25, American Legion, Indiana branch, is typical:

PRINCETON, IND., April 1, 1920.

Mr. O. R. LUHRING,
Congressman, First District,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LUHRING: At a recent meeting of Princeton Post No. 25, American Legion, upon motion of Mr. Ralph Wood, local insurance officer, a resolution was unanimously passed by the post directing the post adjutant to write you, conveying to you our thanks and appreciation for the most efficient services you have rendered in the matter of war-risk insurance problems of ex-service men. I take great pleasure in carrying out these instructions.

We have a most excellent war-risk insurance officer in that he has been highly successful in solving our problems, but he assures us that were it not for the splendid assistance and cooperation rendered by you the results would not have been nearly so successful.

Yours, very truly,

T. MORTON MCDONALD,
Post Adjutant, Princeton Post No. 25,
American Legion, Indiana Branch.

For the veterans of the Civil War and their widows I had the pleasure of voting for the so-called Fuller bill, which became a law May 1, 1920. Under the provisions of this law the minimum pension is now fixed at $50 per month but is substantially increased in cases of extreme disability. I have also had the pleasure of serving them in other matters of importance, and which required a thorough understanding and knowledge of the various pension laws in order to correctly advise them of their rights and necessitated frequent communication with the Bureau of Pensions in reference thereto.

In addition to my attention to matters of interest to the ex-service man and the Civil War veteran I prevailed upon the Department of Agriculture to change its exhibit schedules so as to send to the Evansville Centennial Exposition a $75,000 exhibit. I obtained a ruling from the Census Bureau with reference to the boundaries of the city of Evansville, thus giving the city a just count of population. I also secured the Coast Guard cutter Kankakee for Evansville for rescue and other work in flood times on the Ohio River.

For individual constituents I have successfully handled claims of various sorts and in various amounts, including claim against the Government of Guadaloupe growing out of the seizure of a shipment of flour, claims for lost Liberty bonds, and lost-baggage claims of ex-service men. Also passport applications, changes of rural mail routes so as to afford better service, allocation of coal cars to the mines in southern Indiana, and a thousand and one other matters of more or less importance, including assistance to residents of the first district employed here in obtaining transfers, promotions, and increase of pay.

Out of this service has grown real practical experience and an extensive acquaintance with Members of Congress and the various chiefs of bureaus, divisions, and departments, which is not only valuable to my constituency but the source of no little pleasure to me. The experience thus gained is an asset, the importance of which was clearly pointed out by ex-Speaker CHAMP CLARK, the great Democratic leader, in an address delivered by him on the subject of "The making of a Representative." At the time he delivered the address in 1916 the ex-Speaker was serving his twenty-second year as a Congressman, and therefore knew whereof he spoke. He said:

A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

* * * * * * *

It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has the quicker he will get up. If he possess these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the "topnotchers."

* * * * * * *

No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country.

The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man young enough to learn and to grow, with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps him amazingly in doing things. We live in parlous times. Abraham Lincoln's favorite argument for his own reelection was that it is unwise to swap horses in the middle of the river—which applies to Congressmen as well as Presidents.

I can speak freely on this subject without violating the proprieties, for my constituents have kept me here 22 years, and for 20 years have given me nominations without opposition, for all of which favors I thank them from the bottom of my heart. Their generous action and unwavering friendship have enabled me to devote all my time to the public service. I have not been compelled to spend any portion of my time in "mending my fences." My constituents have attended to that. God bless them!

I have endeavored in this statement to give a brief account of my doings as a Member of this Congress. It has been my purpose to faithfully serve the country and attend to the business of my constituents. I hope that I have been successful.

Vernon Richardson's "Civil Bonus."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KING SWOPE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Speaker, there has just been brought to my attention to-day, the last day of the present session of Congress, just a few moments before adjournment, an article which was published by the Danville Advocate, which is false and was published with the knowledge of its falsity. The editor of that paper is Vernon Richardson, who was located right here in Washington during the war doing stenographic and other office work for one of Kentucky's Senators, which is usually done by a woman and which is now being done by a woman. I have just been told by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate that this man, Vernon Richardson, drew a bonus of $240 per year in addition to his regular pay the last year he was located here in Washington, and I have also just been told by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he is at present drawing a bonus of $240 in addition to his salary of $2,000 per year, making him a total bonus of $480, which the taxpayers are furnishing while he attacks a bonus for the soldiers, and says that the soldier bonus will cost every man, woman, and child, white, and black, $200, which is false and he knows it. He furthermore knows, or should know, that if it were apportioned it would not cost over $15 instead of $200, and he also knows that the tax only applies on large incomes, and he would not have to pay one cent of tax to pay the soldiers, and neither will anyone else whose income is $5,000 or less, unless he transfers real estate or stocks and bonds. He also says, in substance, that the soldiers of the Revolutionary War and Civil War had many more hardships than the soldiers who fought Germany. He is very ignorant on that subject or is again trying to distort the truth. Everyone knows that the soldiers of the World War had to face more death-dealing devices and more suffering than ever before in the history of the world. This same paper tries to attribute those falsehoods to the citizens of Danville.

I challenge him to give the name of any citizen of Danville or any other place who made such a foolish remark as that the soldier bonus would average a cost of $200 to every man, woman, and child. I was raised in the city of Danville, and I know that there is not a citizen in Danville so unpatriotic as to make those false assertions published by the Advocate except the editor of the Advocate himself, who is now drawing a bonus, but who does not want the soldiers to have any. What does he draw his bonus for? Nothing. He admitted himself there was very little work in the customhouse in Danville. He has been sucking a $240 "bonus bottle" for the last two years and now objects to the soldiers, who served for $1 a day, receiving an additional $1 a day, which on the average will be less than the bonus he has received in civil employment. He is simply taking orders from "higher-up bosses," who seek to deprive the soldiers of any consideration whatever, but I do not propose to let Vernon Richardson stop me from giving full credit to the men who served their country. I have kept my promise to the people I represent. I helped to pass the bill known as the "Sweet bill," which increases the compensation of disabled soldiers. I helped to secure a reform in the courts-martial practice, and it was my pleasure and honor to open the debate and vote for the soldier-bonus bill, which passed last Saturday. I supported the Sells bill for the pensioning of Spanish-American War veterans and the Fuller bill for the Civil and Mexican War veterans, because I believe it is the prime duty of every nation to take care of its defenders. I have voted for the smallest appropriation consistent with the proper discharge of the Government's business. I have voted for no taxes that would oppress the poor or impose on anyone. I helped pass the farmers' collective-bargaining bill, which should be a help to both producer and consumer. I have carried out my promises to the people who honored me and refuse even at this late moment to sit idly by and let Vernon Richardson or any other "civil-bonus grabber" belittle the requests of the men who served their country or criticize me for keeping my word to the soldiers of the eighth district.

The Encroachments of the Japanese on the Pacific Coast—A National Peril.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JAMES D. PHELAN,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Friday, February 20, 1920.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, a Japanese colony under the American flag is not compatible with the growth of an American State. The soil of California is being absorbed by the Japanese, and legislation, State and Federal, is now being evoked to stem the yellow tide. It is a race as well as an economic problem. I have shown this in a recent address on the Japanese demand for race equality, and I desire to continue my remarks and make particular reference to the conditions now existing in my State.

It will be asked, "Is not California a prosperous State?" Yes; but the seeds of its dissolution are being planted. It instinctively shrinks from a harvest of death.

> The fell disease which must destroy at length
> Grows with its growth and strengthens with its strength.

To my knowledge men have gone, for instance, from Massachusetts into California rural districts, where the Japanese have acquired the best agricultural land, and have said, "We are going back to Massachusetts, because we came out here and found that while the land is fertile the character of our neighbors is forbidding and we can not bring up our children in such an environment; we are barred from social intercourse; there is no community life." In one case a man told me he walked 3 miles in order to engage in conversation in the English language with the country storekeeper and his wife at a public crossroad. A Senator in this body told me his brother in Louisiana had acquired $20,000 and was going to California to buy a farm, until he heard the Japanese had, like a plague, spread over the fair surface of that State, and he remained away. Where will this end?

What have the Japanese done? They have contributed largely to the cultivation of the soil. But their presence and lower standards exclude all others. I have in my hand a statement of Japanese origin, and therefore not overestimated. It says that there is a total acreage of berries in California of 6,500, of which the Japanese cultivate 5,968 acres, or 91.8 per cent; of celery the Japanese cultivate 89 per cent; of asparagus the Japanese cultivate 82 per cent; of seeds, 79 per cent; of onions, 76 per cent; of tomatoes, 66 per cent; of cantaloupes, 63 per cent; and so on. Think of it! I ask leave to print in the RECORD the remainder of the statistical table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Product.	Acreage by Japanese.	Total acreage by all.	Per cent of Japanese to total acreage.
Berries	5,968	6,500	91.8
Celery	3,568	4,000	89.2
Asparagus	9,927	12,000	82.7
Seeds	15,847	20,000	79.2
Onions	9,251	12,112	76.3
Tomatoes	10,616	16,000	66.3
Cantaloupes	9,581	15,000	63.8
Sugar beets	51,604	102,949	50.1
Green vegetables	17,852	75,000	23.8
Potatoes	18,830	90,175	20.8
Hops	1,260	8,000	15.7
Grapes	47,439	360,000	13.1
Beans	77,107	592,000	13
Rice	16,640	106,220	10
Cotton	18,000	179,869	10

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, this table simply shows that the Japanese, only a few years in the land, have already taken over the cultivation of all these various and profitable products, which prior to their coming in numbers, 20 years ago, were cultivated, though perhaps not in the same abundance, by a thrifty white population—men, women, and children—living in happy homes dotting a smiling land. We have still the production, but we have lost what is much dearer to us—the desirable population out of which American citizens can be made. California refuses submissively to permit its native population to be driven off the soil. If these people want California, let them take it not stealthily, by this process of economic penetration, but let them fight for it. California unfortunately is just as much their tributary territory to-day under our generous laws as though they had conquered it by the power of arms.

Where does the money of production go? These people are so clever and imitative that they have their own employment agencies, their own marketing agencies, their own price-fixing organizations, their own banks; and, dealing with themselves, they have become out of all proportion to their numbers an exceedingly rich community.

Under our laws they can go back to Japan and then return to America. In Japan they make their investments and maintain their homes and preserve their loyalty. The Japanese Government, not unlike the former Government of the Kaiser, looks after its nationals throughout the world, making them tributary to the home land and to the home Government, not only in matters of money, but in military and naval organization. It can call on them wherever they are. They are not released from allegiance. Emperor worship—Shintoism—is their creed. In the Pacific a great empire is dawning which, unless we are watchful, will some day dominate not only Asia but North and South America as well, for it seems to me that in the history of nations the older ones have sooner or later fallen while the young have risen. They come up with barbaric vigor and overwhelm civilized States which by dint of exploration, privation, and labor have won leisure and have established culture and promoted the arts and sciences. Unless we take to heart the lessons of history we will, by our lack of vigilance, permit a foothold to be gained by these people which will ultimately not only defeat us commercially in the carrying trade, as they are fast doing, but militarily in the next world war. Our civilization is at stake.

The Japanese birth rate in the Territory of Hawaii and in the State of California indicates their fecundity; they are a most prolific people. In Hawaii last year the number of Japanese born was 5,029; the number of whites, 328. I read from the table of vital statistics of the California State Board of Health, twenty-fifth biennial report, which shows a constant increase in the birth rate of the Japanese from 1906 to 1917, and a decrease comparatively of whites, with this comment:

> The decrease in the proportion of white babies is due to the marked increases in Japanese birth registrations, as follows: Beginning in 1906, 134; in 1917, 4,108, or an increase of about 3,000 per cent.

In the rural districts of Los Angeles County—outside the incorporated cities and towns—the most productive county in the State, 33⅓ per cent of the births are Japanese.

That was revealed by the report of the health officer, Dr. Pomeroy, who gives the percentages of births as follows: White, 48 per cent; Japanese, 33.4 per cent; Mexican, 18.2 per cent; Chinese, 0.1 per cent, Negro, 0.1 per cent.

Of every 3 persons born in the rural districts in certain parts of California 1 is a Japanese. Their birth rate is 65 to the thousand, against the white birth rate of 16. Dr. Pomeroy has prepared a statement which shows that in the year 2010—or in about 90 years from now—there will, at this ratio of birth, be more native Japanese in California than there will be whites.

So, Mr. President, this is a problem of the first importance, of which the people of the East have very little or no conception.

The "gentlemen's agreement" of 1907 is the means by which we are now, and have been since 1907, trying to keep out the tide; but the tide has not been kept out. In 1908 there were 9,544 arrivals; in 1918 there were 11,143 arrivals, although the "gentlemen's agreement" is supposed to operate so as to exclude all except diplomatists, merchants, and legitimate students—nonlaborers. This is elaborated in the Report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, 1908.

The point about the "gentlemen's agreement" is this: In the absence of an exclusion law, a measure which I have proposed and which is now pending in committee, the Japanese Emperor may any day, by revoking his agreement, open wide the doors to an influx which would overwhelm our Western States. Hawaii is submerged now. The governor of the Territory of Hawaii, recently testifying before congressional committees, says that there are 120,000 Japanese in Hawaii who have come there within the last 15 years, and there are 12,000 Americans, and in less than 10 to 14 years the whites and Hawaiians will be outvoted and the Japanese will control the Territorial legislature and fill the municipal offices. So without striking a blow the Japanese will govern an American Territory which is supposed to be the strategic key of the Pacific, and it presents a most ridiculous—if it were not so serious—situation that we have in vast numbers the enemy in case of trouble, comfortably domiciled within the works, while the enemy is moving upon the works; and I do not know what would become of the garrison under such circumstances.

Under the league covenant there is a provision by which mandates are to be granted to nations for the government of the German possessions taken over by the league. Among these possessions are the islands of the Pacific north of the Equator, such as the Marshall and Caroline Islands, right on the path between the United States, Hawaii, and the Philippines; and should Japan, employing the great navy which she is building now with feverish strides, endeavor to come over the Pacific and reduce Guam and Hawaii and storm the gates of Seattle, San Francisco, and Los Angeles, she would be protected on her way by having these islands under her "mandatory rights" to protect the progress of her fleet. Possession of those islands brings her 2,000 miles nearer to our shores, and the military men say that it would be an advantage which we could not, perhaps, overcome. She is now constructing a Gibraltar in the Pacific, and we are not aroused to our danger.

Japan craftily agreed with England and Italy and France to take over those islands as mandatory before the league was formed or organized, although by the terms of the treaty these islands are given to the league. She has forestalled the action of the league, and that is one of the arguments in favor of an early ratification of the treaty—that we may participate in checking these schemes of spoliation; in checking these schemes by which a great military advantage will be given to a possible enemy, which at the same time is quietly seizing our trade. I have previously shown to the Senate that the American trade in these islands has already been destroyed by Japan, whereas this trade enjoyed peaceful prosperity for 16 years under German rule. There was a real "open door" there then; and now, I am told, the door is banged in the face of the enterprising American merchants who seek to protect the trade they had established by years of business enterprise and pioneering courage. The "open door" is a policy of the United States. We want neither mandates nor possessions. What has become of the island of Yap, desired by the President for cable and radio communications to the East? We are not acquisitive, and all we ask—we have the power to insist if we desire to exert it—is the privileges of trade through an open door—open for all; and if we can not get that, then it will be our duty, as a first-class power, to insist upon it, and to enforce our rights. If we do not enforce our rights, we will not deserve the respect of nations. As the world is organized we are obliged to assert our rights or suffer them to be extinguished.

There is one thing to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate while discussing this question—and I am going over a much wider area than I had anticipated when I began—that the Japanese population in California is admitted by those who have put forth propaganda, the Japanese Association of America, to be 68,982, but it aggregates now possibly well over 100,000. With 120,000 in Hawaii, and 50,000 outside of California, there is a population of Japanese under the American flag of about 260,000. I am advised by the supervisors of the census that the Japanese are avoiding enumeration, in order to keep down the appearance of numerical strength, and they are engaged in the business of concealment and law evasion all the time.

Under the administration of Senator, then governor, JOHNSON, in 1913, a law was passed by the California Legislature forbidding them to own land. They immediately employed counsel, and they acquired land under our corporation laws, as minority stockholders, and by long leases, extended in advance by renewals. Their children born upon the soil, under the fourteenth amendment, are ipso facto American citizens, and with the money of the adults take the land by guardians and so evade and defeat our State laws. They are acquiring land very rapidly, just in as great a proportion, I may say, as they are bringing forth children. Their vernacular press has editorials which I have read, headed "Beget! Beget! Beget!" "Acquire land now while you may; there is a danger of prohibitive laws." And so there is a drive on by which the Japanese population in California is greatly increasing and the agricultural area in their hands is being greatly enlarged.

Where will this end? The governor has been petitioned to call a special session of the legislature, and it is sincerely to be hoped that he will do so. He has been so slow, however, that the people of California, who have organized north and south in order to bring about some remedy, have proposed initiative legislation. If necessary, the people by direct legislation will cure the evil, so far as law can cure it within the jurisdiction of a State.

Pending in the Senate of the United States are bills introduced by me, not only for guarding the border—where surreptitious entry is a scandal—but for effectively restricting immigration in order that the "gentlemen's agreement" may not be our sole and only reliance. It is proposed to exclude the Japanese, just as other nationals of the Orient are excluded, by establishing a zone from which they may not come; and then there is a constitutional amendment proposed by which the children of persons ineligible to citizenship, born upon the soil, can not become ipso facto American citizens, because as American citizens they are defeating the State laws denying Asiatics land ownership and threatening as in Hawaii to ultimately gain political power. So they will be deprived, if these measures prevail, of the privileges and immunities that spring from American citizenship, which should be a boon prized and honored, a safeguard for the Republic, not a menace, but which now by the laxity of our system is idly bestowed upon every person born upon the soil, no matter how unworthy, how unfit, how disloyal, how undesirable. That constitutional amendment, if it prevails, will provide that the children of aliens ineligible to citizenship shall not be citizens, although born in the United States, but Congress may, by appropriate legislation, naturalize those whom it may desire. It is flexible to that extent. It leaves the door open to individuals but accepts no accession to citizenship in mass.

There is so much to this question, apart from land ownership, voting privilege, and intermarriage, that I must exercise no little restraint to forego telling you that these aliens have taken our fishing industry from us and they have taken the commerce of the seas, and they have begun to take our manufactures.

For instance, in the silk-manufacturing districts of this country they have dismantled and taken the plants up bodily and shipped them to Japan, and there they cultivate the raw silk, and with the raw silk they will make the finished product, and that product will compete with the mills of New Jersey and of Pennsylvania, and out of employment will go thousands and thousands of mechanics and operatives; and with their cheaper labor and their initiative ability they will manufacture for us our linens and our cottons as well as our silks. Manufacturing machinery is the largest item of their imports. They are entering the mechanic trades and crafts. There is no work of which they are not capable.

I say this in order that their power and their strength may not be underrated. When, in view of these facts, you see that they have singled out the islands of the Pacific and the Pacific coast of North America as their favorite territory for settlement and colonization, you must sympathize with those who are the warders of the Golden Gate, who raise the alarm and inform the country, living in fancied security, that there is a new rival in the western seas and a menacing power on the horizon. The development of the Pacific in the next 50 years will be, perhaps, the greatest event in the world's theater of action. What we were told 70 years ago by William H. Seward has been in part realized; but we will see the realization of it more fully in the years ahead of us. Upon the shores of that ocean dwell the greatest populations of the earth. There is an ominous awakening. Shall America survive and serve those nations, or shall the scepter pass to alien hands? Shall the American Republic go down in humiliation? Shall our children taste the bitterness of subjection?

I am very glad that our President at the Paris conference, standing with the representatives of Australia and New Zealand, stemmed these insidious movements of the Japanese to establish a principle of race equality, under which they would have flooded this land. They would have come in freely as immigrants. They would have sought, and would have been granted, naturalization, the elective franchise, the privilege of owning land, of intermarriage, of assuming all the rights, duties, functions, and privileges of American citizenship, while at the same time failing to support our institutions, failing to assimilate, and, owing allegiance to an alien Emperor, become an antagonistic element, which would breed domestic trouble and ultimately war.

Our form of government rests upon the foundation of a prosperous and patriotic citizenry of assimilable people. To suffer its deterioration is to undermine democratic institutions and invite disaster.

The only question involved is one of self-preservation.

Is not our country worth striving for and fighting for? Has not the white man earned the security of his home? If so, the Nation's policy should be now and always to protect its people and guard the civilization which patriots and martyrs have given us in trust for posterity.

Postal Salaries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENJAMIN F. WELTY,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 14338) to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service with a view to the reclassification and readjustment of such salaries on an equitable basis.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks on this bill I would say that conditions in almost every community show that the Postal Service has been falling down because the employees are unable to continue with the salaries they are receiving. I am not satisfied with this bill, because I think that the salary should be sufficient to meet the cost of living, and I do not believe that the bill would pass the House without amendment if the rule under which we are working would permit amendments.

I have been receiving a large number of complaints because of the condition of the Postal Service. At first the unthinking were inclined to blame the Postmaster General because of the poor service they were receiving, but when one considers that out of 6,070 clerks employed at a salary of $1,200, 1,816 resigned because the salary was not sufficient to provide for the necessities of life for themselves and families, one wonders how the postmaster can procure sufficient experienced help to take care of the constantly increasing mail. Postal duties, like any other duties, must be learned in order to become efficient. Some time ago Congress raised the salaries of the postal employees, but it seems that even with this increase persons continued to leave the service, and new men had to be broken in from time to time, who knew nothing about the service. Because of this the mails continue slow and uncertain. However, I am indeed glad that this small increase is granted, for the public demands efficiency from these men who handle the messages which carry on the business of the country, as well as the messages from loved ones.

If through carelessness or inability to handle these messages there is a delay of a day or so, a complaint will be made not against the individual, but the Government itself. It is this branch of the Government that comes in contact with every home and every business. It is the character of the postal employee which determines the impression the public receives of the kind of Government we have. We can not afford to employ all classes of individuals, even though their honesty can not be questioned. Courtesy, promptness, and willingness to serve must stand out as supreme in these messengers carrying the news of the day.

This increase, according to the report of the joint commission, will cost the Government $34,375,087, and the additional increase for the succeeding three years will average approximately $3,700,000 per year. This may seem a large amount, but we can not hope to receive first-class service unless we have trained men who are always anxious to do their full duty and please the patrons they are serving.

Clerks at first and second class post offices and carriers in city delivery in the five grades will receive under this bill as follows: Grade 1, $1,400; grade 2, $1,500; grade 3, $1,600; grade 4, $1,700; grade 5, $1,800; while substitutes, temporaries, and auxiliaries are to receive 60 cents per hour, and special clerks are divided into two grades and receive $1,900 and $2,000.

Printers, mechanics, and skilled laborers are to be paid and promoted as clerks. Watchmen, messengers, and laborers are divided into two grades and receive $1,350 and $1,450.

In the Railway Mail Service there are six grades, as follows: Grade 1, $1,600; grade 2, $1,700; grade 3, $1,850; grade 4, $2,000; grade 5, $2,150; grade 6, $2,300.

Rural delivery carriers receive under this bill $1,800 for 24 miles and $30 for each mile in excess of 24. Deductions for partial failure to perform service shall not exceed rate of pay per mile per day for 24 miles or less and likewise in excess of 24 miles, and motor route carriers for 50 miles and over receive not in excess of $2,600 per annum.

Village delivery carriers are to receive from $1,000 to $1,200 under regulations to be prescribed by the department.

Fourth-class postmasters shall receive 145 per cent on cancellation of $75 per quarter and less; 120 per cent from $75 to $100 of cancellation of $75 per quarter; and in excess of $100 per quarter, 115 per cent on first $100, 75 per cent on next $100 or less, and 60 per cent on the remainder. When compensation amounts to $1,000 and gross postal receipts amount to $1,500 within one year, fourth-class offices shall be advanced to third class.

Third-class postmasters are increased $300 from basic salaries each, the salaries ranging from $1,000 to $2,200. Clerk hire to be same as under present law readjusted annually.

Second-class postmasters are increased from $100 to $300 each, the salary ranging from $2,300 to $3,000. Assistant postmasters to be in eight grades from $1,800, with increases of $50 in each grade to $2,150.

First-class postmasters to be in 14 grades, with modified schedules in each grade, according to gross receipts, from $40,000 to more than $7,000,000. Increases range from $200 to $300 and $400, where the salary is now $3,600 and $3,700; to $400 and $500 where the salary is now $3,700 and $3,800; and $500 and $600 where the salary is now $3,900 and $4,000. No increase is provided where the salary is now $5,000 and over.

Thus when one considers that the value of the dollar is only about 50 per cent of what it was before the war, the increase can not be considered excessive, and it is because of this feeling of the membership of the House that not a single vote was cast against the bill when placed on its passage.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the Republican leader of the House, Mr. MONDELL, has stated that the appropriations by this Congress for the fiscal year commencing July 1 amount to $4,859,890,327.30. This is the truth, but it is not the whole truth. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I want the American people to know that in addition to the direct appropriation of the sum mentioned this Congress has by reappropriations and authorizations made available for expenditure at least $543,500,000, making the total amount available for expenditure $5,403,390,327.30.

This is almost five times as much as has ever been spent by the Government in a single year in time of peace, the largest amount heretofore appropriated being $1,114,937,012.02 for the fiscal year 1916. This Congress was in session exactly 150 days, and an authorized expenditure of $5,403,390,327.30 means that the money of the people was appropriated at the rate of $36,000,000 a day, and that to meet the expenditures for next year it will be necessary to levy an average tax of $50 upon every man, woman, and child in America.

Inasmuch as it is advisable that the public should know the total expenditures authorized by a Congress it is exceedingly unfortunate that for political expediency this Republican Congress should have resorted to appropriating money in indirect ways, making absolutely misleading any statement of direct appropriations. For instance, of the total of $543,500,000 which has been made available for expenditure, over and above the total of direct appropriations, there are reappropriations amounting to $156,600,000. This means that of appropriations heretofore made for expenditure during the present fiscal year, $156,600,000 was not expended and under the law would be turned back into the Treasury on July 1. The Congress, however, has provided that this amount instead of being turned into the Treasury should be made available for expenditure during the next year, and has made a corresponding reduction in the amount of direct appropriations. The Republican leaders include this amount in the total amount by which they claim to have reduced the estimates of the departments and call it a "saving"; but the money will be spent, and it makes no difference to the taxpayer whether it is provided in an appropriation or a reappropriation.

Another plan by which the Republican Congress has endeavored to mislead the people as to the total expenditures for the next year is illustrated in the appropriations for the Shipping Board. In order that the Government may have a check upon expenditures it has always required the various agencies of the Government to cover into the Treasury the proceeds of the sale of property and submit estimates for needed appropriations. This year the Shipping Board asked for $225,000,000. The Congress did not make the direct appropriation, but directed that $225,000,000 of the proceeds of the sale of ships should not be covered into the Treasury, but should be made available for expenditure during the next year. The Republican leaders include this amount in the total alleged reduction of estimates and call it a "saving," but a blind man can see and a fool can understand that the money is going to be spent, and it matters little to the taxpayer which one of his pockets it comes out of.

Another instance of this effort to mislead the people by a pretended reduction of appropriations is in the deficiency bill, where the Railroad Administration asked for $420,000,000 to wind up its affairs. Congress appropriated directly $300,000,000, and instead of appropriating the remaining $120,000,000 directed that the Railroad Administration be allowed to use $30,000,000 out of the loan fund appropriated in the transportation act. This money will be spent and the loan fund will, of course, be reimbursed after the election. The balance of $90,000,000 was provided by directing the War Finance Corporation to purchase at par $90,000,000 of Liberty bonds held by the Railroad Administration. In this way the total of $120,000,000 was provided without making a direct appropriation, and the Republican leaders include this in the reduction of estimates and call it a "saving." But the $90,000,000, instead of being "saved," will be spent, and as the War Finance Corporation could not have spent it, this high financiering simply reduced by $90,000,000 the amount of money the War Finance Corporation will have to cover into the Treasury.

It is impossible to tell how many more similar "reductions" have been included in appropriation bills, but the amount available for expenditure in these three items alone totals $471,000,000, which must be added to the total direct appropriations. In addition to this amount, innumerable expenditures have been authorized for which no funds have been appropriated at all. In this class is the Sells bill increasing pensions, which it is estimated will cost next year $12,500,000; the amendment to the vocational rehabilitation act, which will cost $5,000,000; the Navy pay increase, which will cost $25,000,000; and the purchase of farm-loan bonds, which will amount to $30,000,000, making a total of $72,500,000. To meet these authorized expenditures the Congress appropriated no funds, and they will have to be paid out of other funds in the several departments, and in December, after the election, the Congress will appropriate the money. It is notorious that while making most extravagant appropriations and authorizations for new projects and for certain classes of citizens, the Congress failed to provide sufficient funds for certain fixed activities, especially in the Agriculture and Navy Departments, and in December next, after the election, these funds must be provided. But certain it is that when this amount of $72,500,000 and the amount of $471,000,000 is added to the total of direct appropriations it makes the total expenditures of this Congress $5,403,390,327.30.

Confronted by this record of extravagance, the Republican leaders vainly endeavor to excuse themselves by explaining that the estimates of the departments were $1,312,417,650.39 in excess of the appropriations, and that they therefore "saved" this amount of money. No more ridiculous statement has ever been made by a public official. If this statement of the Republican leader, Mr. MONDELL, is correct, and by reducing estimates they have saved more than a billion dollars, why have they not reduced taxes in a corresponding amount?

The fact is that during the past 30 years there have been only two years when the estimates of the departments did not exceed the appropriations. If such a reduction constitutes a "saving," then the last Democratic Congress is entitled to special commendation, for that Congress reduced the estimates of the departments for the fiscal year 1918 in the sum of $5,554,161,598.31.

But, of course, such a reduction constitutes no "saving," and is no test of economy. For instance, under the law the estimates for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1920, had to be submitted by the departments in October, 1919. When the representatives of the departments appeared before the congressional committees in March and April, 1920, conditions had changed and many estimates were entirely withdrawn and many more greatly reduced. They are not credited with such withdrawals by the political bookkeeping of Congress, but the Congress credits itself with having reduced such estimates, and with having "saved" money.

Of the alleged reduction of a billion dollars in the estimates for next year, $611,118,580.18 is a reduction of the estimates for the sundry civil bill. A fair illustration of how this was accomplished is offered by the Shipping Board appropriations which are carried in that bill. In October, 1919, the Shipping Board submitted an estimate of $446,270,652 for the year commencing July 1. When they came before the Appropriations Committee this spring conditions had changed, contracts had been canceled, and the board stated they would need only $225,000,000. The Congress authorized them to spend this amount, and instead of making a direct appropriation directed that instead of turning into the Treasury the proceeds from sale of ships as heretofore, that they make $225,000,000 of such proceeds available for expenditure next year. It is in this way that the Republican Congress "reduced" the estimates for the sundry civil bill $600,000,000, and its leaders now attempt to fool the people into believing that in so doing they "saved" this amount of money.

Of the balance of this remarkable "saving," $592,053,855 is an alleged reduction of the estimates for the Army. When the War Department submitted its estimates in October, 1919, the Army reorganization bill had not been considered. It was the duty of Congress, not the department, to fix the size of the Army. The General Staff had recommended an Army of 500,000 men. The department submitted an estimate of the cost of maintaining such an Army. Congress fixed the Army at 300,000 men, and when department officials appeared before the congressional committee, they advised Congress how much would be necessary to maintain such an Army as had been provided by Congress, thereby reducing the estimates, and this is the explanation of the reduction of $592,063,855 in the Army estimate, which the Republican leaders call a saving. In the same way when War Department officials appeared before the Appropriations Committee they voluntarily reduced the estimate for fortifications by the sum of $50,000,000. When they did so, the Republican leaders called that a "saving" by Congress.

By the same hocus-pocus methods the Republicans in the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress reduced the amounts appropriated by the previous Democratic Congress in the bills that failed in the Senate because of the filibuster of Republican Senators. They claim that when they met in May and passed the bills that had failed in March, they reduced the amount appropriated by $939,692,541.97. Of this amount $246,011,651 is an alleged reduction in the sundry civil bill for that year. As a matter of fact, in this bill they made available for expenditure $50,000,000 more than had been provided by the Democratic Congress. The bill as passed by the Democratic Congress provided $660,000,000 for the Shipping Board. The Republican Congress made the same amount available, but appropriated directly only $356,000,000, providing the balance of $304,000,000 by the reappropriation of various funds about to be covered into the Treasury.

And notwithstanding the fact that the Shipping Board has already spent this sum of $660,000,000 the Republican leaders have the nerve to attempt to fool the people into believing that they "saved" this money when they reduced the estimates in the hocus-pocus manner described. Instead of a reduction, the total amount made available by appropriations and reappropriations was $50,000,000 in excess of the total amount made available by the Democratic Congress.

The other alleged saving in the bills passed during the first session was in the Army and Navy appropriations for the year commencing July 1, 1919. When these bills were passed by the Democratic Congress in February, 1919, we had 1,500,000 soldiers in France. Republicans and Democrats believed it would be impossible to have them returned and demobilized for many months to come and that the appropriation for the year beginning July 1 should be on the basis of 500,000 men. The bill failed March 4, and when four months later the Republicans repassed it, owing to the wonderful efficiency of the War Department and the Navy Department in returning our soldiers so much more rapidly than had been anticipated it was possible to appropriate for an average Army of 300,000 instead of 500,000. Speaking of the action of the Democratic Congress, Representative KAHN, Republican chairman of the Military Committee, said:

> The committee was justified at that time in appropriating for that number because it seemed to the committee that it would not be possible to demobilize our forces as rapidly as they have been demobilized.

And for the same reason it was possible to reduce the appropriations for the Navy. Representative BUTLER, Republican chairman of the Naval Committee, advised the House that the amount appropriated by the Democratic Congress could be reduced only because of "conditions, plans, or events occurring subsequent to the adjournment of Congress."

Reference to these matters shows the absurdity of claims of "saving" now being made. Even if these bills had been passed in March and the money provided, it could have been spent only for the maintenance of the Army, and if by reason of the efficient administration of the War Department the Army was demobilized earlier than expected the funds remaining would have been covered back into the Treasury.

If, however, anyone is disposed to believe that by reducing the direct appropriation in the bills referred to this Congress did save $939,692,541.97, then why did this Congress fail to correspondingly reduce the taxes?

The only fair test as to whether or not a Congress has been economical in its appropriations is a comparison of its expenditures with the expenditures of a previous year for the same purposes. The last fiscal year prior to our entrance into the war was 1916, and the accompanying table shows the appropriations for that year, when the Democratic Party was in control of Congress, as compared with the appropriations for next year:

Grand total	1,114,937,012.02	4,859,890,327.30	+3,744,953,315.28

It is fair to call attention to the fact that there can be no comparison of the permanent appropriations because of the greatly increased amount made necessary next year by our increased public debt. It is equally true that in the Army and Navy bills there may be "hang overs" of the war, but it is apparent that in every civil branch of the Government there has been an indefensible increase by this Congress that makes hopeless any reduction of oppressive taxation. This statement does not, of course, include the soldiers' bonus which passed the House and is estimated to cost approximately $2,000,000,000. The statement shows that this Republican Congress has spent the money of the people in a manner that makes the proverbial sailor seem a tightwad, and makes us wonder what they would have done had they not been pledged to economy. It is convincing proof that we can not hope for economy from a Republican Congress, and judging from the disclosures in the Senate of the primary campaign expenditures of those Republicans who seek to be the Chief Executive, we can not hope for economy from a Republican Executive.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. WOODS,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920,

On the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this report believing that it goes a long step forward in adjusting the inequalities heretofore existing in regard to the District revenue. I believe that the property owners of the District of Columbia should be required to pay tax commensurate with the taxes paid by property owners in cities of approximately the same population throughout the country. When the property owners of the District have done this they have, in my judgment, done all in that respect that should be required of them.

The remaining revenue needed to make and keep Washington the most beautiful city in the world should be contributed by the Federal Government.

I wish, however, to call the attention of the House to two circumstances which are not remedied by the adoption of this conference report:

First. The rate of taxation on intangible property is left at 3 mills, which is very much below the rate prevailing in the several States. In Virginia the rate on intangibles is 11½ mills, and in many of the States the rate on intangibles is the same as the rate on other property. This condition, which is allowed to remain, results in inviting the holders of large intangible estates residing in the different States to take up their residence, or their alleged residence, at Washington and is making the Capital City a Mecca for tax dodgers.

I have the names of 10 such persons, formerly residents of Virginia, who have made Washington their home, presumably from this motive. I shall not give their names, as these men should not be held up to public censure for taking advantage of a situation the Congress has allowed to exist. If censure is to be visited upon anyone, it justly falls upon the Members of Congress.

I have no disposition to indulge in the demagogue raillery against wealth which has been legitimately earned, but no class of taxpayers are better able to pay than the holders, particularly the large holders, of intangibles.

As a result of this policy the District is collecting on the assessed value of its real estate for 1920, $426,623,630, at a rate of $1.50 per hundred, taxes amounting to $6,399,354.45. On tangible personal property for 1919 it has collected $1,794,631.70. The District's intangible property for 1919 was assessed at $293,506,446, and yet the tax collected on this large amount of intangible property for 1919 amounts to only $880,519.34.

The little city of Lynchburg in my district, of not over 45,000 population, collected on intangibles last year $253,606.46, and on incomes for State purposes $154,386.78, making a total of $407,993.24, or nearly half as much tax as was paid from this same source in the great and wealthy city of Washington. The result of this has been that the holders of large intangibles leave the States and take up their residence, or alleged residence, in the District of Columbia so as to evade the taxes they would pay in the States. One of them has told me personally that he could afford to pay the entire expenses of his family here in the District out of the amount of taxes he saved.

I file herewith a statement gotten from the District officials showing the assessment and taxes paid in the District upon real, tangible, and intangible property:

Taxes in the District of Columbia—1920 levy on real estate.

Assessed value of land	$213,499,811
Assessed value of improvements	213,123,819
Total assessed value of real estate	426,623,630

Tax assessed at rate of $1.50 on $100.
Amount to be collected on real estate $6,399,354.45.

1919 levy on personal property.

Total tax on tangible property for collection	$1,794,631.70
Value of intangible property to be taxed at three-tenths of 1 per cent	293,506,466.00
Amount of tax to be collected on intangibles	880,519.34
Total levy on personal property in the District of Columbia	2,675,151.04

The objection I have to the conference report is that in order to meet the increased revenue under the new apportionment it proposes to raise the tax on real estate to 2 per cent upon a two-thirds valuation assessment, which will result in collecting between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 from that source. It would have been much more equitable to have increased the tax on the $293,000,000 worth of intangible property from 3 mills to 10 mills, which would have increased the revenue $2,000,000, without imposing additional burdens upon the real estate. This increased tax upon the real estate will simply be passed on to the tenants and in great measure would ultimately fall upon the Government employees, and in its last analysis will therefore come back to the Government itself for payment. I sincerely hope this inequality will be remedied at the next session of Congress.

Another matter I wish to call to the attention of the House, which I presume is due to an oversight. The District Committee, through its subcommittee, after taking a great deal of testimony, increased the basic salaries of the District policemen and firemen. The House, in pursuance of this investigation, fixed the salaries of these employees with the distinct understanding, which was pointed out on the floor, that to these basic salaries the bonus should be added. The House coupled with the provision increasing the pay of these employees a provision that they should cease affiliation with any organization using the method of strike to enforce demands. The employees acquiesced in this provision and notified the proper authorities that they had ceased such affiliation and, I believe, surrendered their union charters. Notwithstanding this action on the part of Congress, the Congress by this measure is depriving these two classes of employees of a large part of the bonus. I submit that it has resulted in unintentional injustice to them, which it behooves Congress at the earliest opportunity to remedy.

Whatever may be the wise course for Congress to pursue in dealing with strikes and strike organizations, this one thing is clear, that Congress should not take any action or permit any condition to remain with reference to its employees that gives them just cause for strike.

Congress Has Not Said the Last Word on Postal Wages.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN MacCRATE,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Speaker, the postal employees are emphatic in stating they are not satisfied with the proposed scale of wages.

Under the circumstances attending the vote on the report of the postal commission it was not possible to present amendments. A comparison of the amounts carried in the bill with amounts paid by private business clearly shows that the Government is not meeting the standard set outside. No Member of Congress can fail to realize that if the Postal Service is to meet the requirements of the country it is absolutely necessary that the fair and just demands of the postal employees shall be met at the earliest possible moment. Congress has not yet said the last word on postal wages.

Republican Sixty-sixth Congress Reduces by $2,710,000,000 the Democratic Administration's Requests for Appropriations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES W. GOOD,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the Sixty-fifth Congress came to an end on March 4, 1919. That Congress had a Democratic majority, both in the House and in the Senate. When that Congress adjourned its real work remained unfinished. It failed to pass six of the regular appropriation bills; it failed to pass the third deficiency bill for the fiscal year 1919; and it likewise failed to pass the bill carrying appropriations to supply deficiencies in the Government's operation of railroads.

On May 19, 1919, the President convened the Sixty-sixth Congress in extraordinary session to do the work the Sixty-fifth Congress had failed to perform. This Congress has a Republican majority in both Houses. How well it has performed its work, how faithfully it has guarded the interests of the taxpayer and has labored to carry out a real economy program, is reflected in a résumé of the appropriations which it has made.

The previous Congress failed to pass the Agricultural appropriation bill, the Army appropriation bill, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, the Indian appropriation bill, the sundry civil appropriation bill, the third deficiency appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1919, and the bill carrying an appropriation to supply deficiencies in the operation of the railroads by the President. These bills passed the House, and in some instances had been acted upon by the appropriating committees of the Senate, and in still other instances the bills had passed both Houses with items in disagreement, but all of them failed of final enactment. An analysis (Exhibit A) of these bills that failed in the previous Congress illustrates the economy of the present Republican Congress as compared with the waste and extravagance of the Democratic Congress that just preceded it.

It has been urged that the action of Congress in refusing to appropriate the full amount estimated does not mean a saving. In some instances that is true, but in the main the refusal of Congress to make appropriations takes away from the executive departments the opportunity to spend the money asked for. It must be remembered that the estimates for expenditures are made by the executive departments, the spending departments of the Government. These estimates go to the President and have his approval, and the departments come to Congress not only with an estimate of the amount which they think will be necessary to spend to carry on the activities of the Government but they also come with a request that Congress appropriate the money. It is, indeed, rare for a spending department to leave any considerable sum of its appropriation unexpended. These departments ask for the money with the intention of spending it. When such funds are once appropriated they are, in the main, expended, and only too frequently are they expended without a just regard for economy and sometimes they are entirely wasted.

It is thus seen that the first session of this Congress saved on the bills that failed of passage in the Democratic Congress the sum of $939,692,541.97, as compared with the last action of that Congress on the bills which failed of passage. If, however, the saving to the taxpayers in those bills is the difference between the amount requested by the President through the various spending departments of the Government and the amount appropriated by Congress, then the actual saving by this Congress on those bills reaches the stupendous sum of $1,685,867,893.64.

The work of the second session of this Congress is marked by the same degree of economy that characterized the first session. The failure of the administration to realize that the war is over and that the people were demanding a return to normal conditions, and so far as taxation is concerned to bring about as soon as possible a reduction in those burdens, made doubly difficult the work of Congress so far as appropriations are concerned. This Congress was called upon to pass appropriation bills to supply the money to carry on the activities of the Government from July 1 of this year to June 30, 1921. Under the law the President and his spending departments made their estimates and requested appropriations either in the regular estimates submitted in the Book of Estimates, or supplemental estimates, or because of laws enacted subsequently to the submission of the Book of Estimates, in the grand total of $5,685,812,929.46, which includes $725,000,000, the estimated amount carried by the transportation act, for which no formal estimate was submitted to Congress. The total amount appropriated, including the permanent annual and miscellaneous appropriations, is $4,373,395,279.07, or a saving on the appropriations for the next fiscal year under the amount requested of $1,312,417,650.39.

But the work of this Congress, so far as appropriations are concerned, did not stop here. It was necessary to pass upon deficiency estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for prior fiscal years. These estimates, likewise submitted by the spending departments, with the President's approval, aggregated $648,500,000. Congress refused to grant many of these requests and reduced many more. It appropriated for these deficiencies $486,495,048.23. The saving on the deficiency estimates, therefore, aggregates $162,004,951.77.

It is thus seen that the total requests for money thus submitted to this session of Congress aggregate $6,334,312,929.46. Of this amount Congress appropriated $4,859,890,327.30, and by its refusal to grant the rest of the money asked for by the spending departments, effected a net saving of $1,474,422,602.16.

If, therefore, the reduction effected by the two sessions of this Congress are to be measured by the difference between the amount which the President through his spending departments asked that they be permitted to spend, and the amount which Congress said they could spend, then the reductions in estimates by this Republican Congress reach the grand total of $3,160,290,495.80. There should be eliminated from this reduction, however, the sum of $450,000,000, which represents the reduction made at the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress in the estimate of the Railroad Administration. That item was resubmitted at the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and should therefore be deducted from the total reduction for the two sessions. The sum of $3,160,290,495.80, reduced by the sum of $450,000,000, leaves a net saving for the two sessions of $2,710,290,495.80.

This is a record of achievement of which the Congress may well be proud, and for which 110,000,000 people laboring under a heavy load of taxation may well be grateful. To have granted the requests of the spending departments, and to have permitted them to spend over $2,710,000,000 in excess of the amount which they will now be allowed to spend, would have meant new taxes or the flotation of loans at a time when it would have been most embarrassing, if not impossible, to sell Government bonds.

The accomplishment of this result is not due to any man or any set of men, but is due to a policy inaugurated by a Republican Congress to carry out the will of the people to reduce expenditures. Congress has been impressed with the importance of reducing the high cost of living and has realized that this can not be done without a reduction in taxation and that to reduce taxation we must first reduce expenditures. On that practical business program this Congress has been working with energy and determination, and it submits these results with confidence that they will meet with the approval of the American people.

At this time I can not pass unnoticed a telegram purporting to have been signed by the President and sent to officials of the railroad brotherhoods, inasmuch as it criticizes Congress for its failure to grant funds requested in his message to Congress on August 8, 1919. A part of that telegram reads as follows:

I received your telegram of June 3. You call my attention to matters that I presented to the present Congress in a special message delivered at a joint session of the two Houses on August 8, 1919. In nine months this Congress has, however, taken no important remedial action with respect to the problem of the cost of living, but it has failed even to give serious consideration to the urgent appeal, oft repeated by me and by the Secretaries of the Treasury, to revise the tax laws, which in their present form are indirectly responsible, in part, for the high cost of living.

In his message to Congress on August 8, 1919, the President asked for an appropriation for the Attorney General to permit him to enforce the laws against profiteering and hoarding the necessaries of life. He asked appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Labor, and the Federal Trade Commission, for investigations and for publicity regarding such investigations.

After enumerating these departments and agencies in that message, he said:

That is, these agencies may perform this indispensable service provided the Congress will supply them with the necessary funds to prosecute their inquiries and keep their price lists up to date. Hitherto the Appropriation Committees of the Houses have not always, I fear, seen the full value of these inquiries, and the departments and commissions have been very much straitened for means to render this service. That adequate funds be provided by appropriation for this purpose, and provided as promptly as possible, is one of the means of greatly ameliorating the present distressing conditions of livelihood that I have come to urge, in this attempt to concert with you the best ways to serve the country in this emergency.

Subsequently he caused to be sent to Congress an estimate for the Department of Justice of $1,000,000, to be used for the detection and prosecution of crime, including the prosecution of profiteers and hoarders; $502,060 for the Department of Agriculture; $475,000 for the Department of Labor; $485,000 for the Department of Commerce; and $500,000 for the Federal Trade Commission.

The Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, to which these requests were referred, held extensive hearings. That committee gave the Department of Justice the $1,000,000 it requested and came to the conclusion that much of the other money if appropriated would be wasted in the employment of useless officers and clerks, that much of it was to carry on a duplication of work in these various departments, and that the appropriations, if made in full, would be largely if not entirely wasted.

The hearings disclosed that the appropriation for the Department of Agriculture was desired, not for the purpose of decreasing prices but for the purpose of increasing food prices to the producer, and the committee was satisfied that the appropriations available for that department were sufficient.

Of the $500,000 asked by the Federal Trade Commission, Congress appropriated $150,000, that being the amount which the commission stated in the hearings they could safely expend in the fight against the high cost of living. What has been the result from this appropriation? On February 11, 1920, almost five months after the appropriation was made, Victor Murdock, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, stated before the Committee on Appropriations with respect to this appropriation as follows:

That $150,000, Mr. GOOD, we understood from you at the time was given to us with the understanding that we were not in the least to waste it; that we were to guard it, take care of it, and up to date we have not touched it, because we found, by reason of the causes which I have just given you, in regard to the difficulty of hiring men, the deep cut in the personnel, and sickness, that we could do what work we could do beneficially on the high cost of living within our regular appropriation.

Here, at least, was one department that by its action was willing to remove the camouflage behind which the administration was acting with respect to reducing the high cost of living by investigations. While this department did as requested by the President and sent in its estimate of $500,000 for money, it realized that it could not reduce the high cost of living by such expenditure, and therefore has not expended a single penny of the money that Congress appropriated as requested by the President. Who is to blame because prices have not been reduced, so far as this item is concerned?

Congress was impressed with the fact that every violator of law, whether he be profiteer or hoarder, who was unlawfully increasing the cost of the necessaries of life, should be sent to prison, and it appropriated every dollar asked by the department for this purpose. And what has been the result? Since that appropriation was made the prices of commodities, according to Government reports, have steadily increased. We have witnessed the price of sugar rise from 10 cents per pound, when the appropriation was granted, to more than 30 cents per pound in certain localities, and to an average price throughout the United States of more than 25 cents per pound. Certainly Congress is not responsible for this increase. Would it not be profitable for the President to examine his own action regarding sugar to ascertain who is responsible for the increase in price?

I refer to these matters because the President's telegram refers to his message of August 8 last, and in that message he asked for these appropriations. His telegram, therefore, and his message to Congress being a reflection upon the work of the committee over which I have the honor to preside, as well as upon Congress as a whole, I deem it my duty to that committee and to Congress to spread the naked facts upon the record.

With great frankness the President said in that message:

I need not recite the particulars of this critical matter; the prices demanded and paid at the sources of supply, at the factory, in the food markets, at the shops, in the restaurants and hotels, alike in the city and in the village. They are familiar to you. They are the talk of every domestic circle and of every group of casual acquaintances, even. It is a matter of familiar knowledge, also, that a process has set in which is likely, unless something is done, to push prices and rents and the whole cost of living higher and yet higher, in a vicious cycle to which there is no logical or natural end. * * *

We must, I think, frankly admit that there is no complete immediate remedy to be had from legislation and Executive action. The free processes of supply and demand will not operate of themselves, and no legislative or Executive action can force them into full and natural operation until there is peace. There is now neither peace nor war.

Since the President delivered that message Congress has passed a joint resolution declaring that the United States is at peace with the world. And yet the President, realizing that the high cost of living can not be reduced until peace comes, by his veto of the resolution declaring that we are at peace, evidently prefers that the profiteer and the hoarder shall continue to exact their merciless and unconscionable toll from the American people rather than agree to peace.

The rest of the President's telegram above quoted refers to a failure of this Congress to revise the tax laws. Certainly the inference to be drawn from that telegram is that Congress failed to reduce taxation, and thus relieve the taxpayer from some of his burdens.

On April 8, 1920, I received from the Secretary of the Treasury a communication in response to an inquiry as to the probable condition of the Treasury on June 30, 1920, so far as he was able to make a forecast. With that letter the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted a Treasury statement showing the estimated receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year 1920, compiled in March, 1920, as compared with similar estimates published in the Secretary's annual report for the fiscal year 1919. That statement gives the estimated receipts and expenditures, and gives in parallel columns the original estimates of receipts and expenditures for 1920 and the revised estimates of receipts and expenditures for 1920. That statement (Exhibit B) is as follows:

I ask a careful analysis of the above statement showing the revised estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury as furnished me on April 8 of this year.

The revised statement shows that the Secretary then estimated that there would be a deficit at the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, of $4,316,890,855.

True, the Secretary stated in his letter that he felt this excess would be considerably less than the revised estimate but he furnished no details and no revision of his estimates. Is this Congress to be condemned because it refused to reduce taxes when the Secretary of the Treasury estimates there may be an excess of expenditures over receipts of $4,316,890,855 at the end of this fiscal year?. What business concern, finding that its expenses were exceeding its revenues, would not attempt to find additional sources of revenue or reduce expenditures? The President would reverse the experience of the business world.

When he finds that the expenses of the Government exceed the revenues of the Government he would, as is shown by his estimate, increase expenses and would at the same time cut off receipts. To adopt such a course would spell financial disaster; for any business concern it would mean bankruptcy.

But there is hope. In the future we must have a business administration, an administration that will turn its attention to the normal activities at home and that will reduce expenditures all along the line. We must bring about a revolution in the Government's financial policies. We must stop spending. We must economize. We must cut out waste and duplication in the Government's service. We must have a work program, and that program must be a business program that will permit the business of the Government, the greatest business in all the world so far as expenditures are concerned, to be conducted along business lines.

In response to the overwhelming demands for economy in the conduct of public affairs the Democratic administration turned a deaf ear. In utter disregard to its platform pledges it continued in a time of peace the waste and extravagance which characterized its conduct of the war. Oblivious of the fact that expenditures were in excess of revenue it demanded of Congress the granting of funds far in excess of real needs. Possessed with power such as has been granted to no other administration, it has to its credit no single act to put the administration of the Government's affairs upon an efficient and economical basis. Its promise to reform the present financial needs of the Government through the adoption of a budget system has been hypocritically disregarded. Had the people in 1918 not given the country a Republican Congress no ray of hope for improvement in the Government's fiscal affairs would be visible.

Over Executive objections the present Congress has attempted to put the Government on a business basis. True to its history and traditions and faithful to its party promises, this Republican Congress has more than redeemed its obligations. Without sacrificing any material interests it has cut down Democratic estimates for appropriations by more than $2,710,000,000. By a change in the rules of the House of Representatives effected at this session hereafter all appropriation bills will be handled by a single committee. The budget and accounting act, which was vetoed by the Presdent in the closing hours of Congress, would have brought about the most thorough organization for the conduct of the financial affairs of the Government ever effected by any country. No greater act of constructive legislation could have been found upon the statute books. The President's refusal to approve of this act strongly indicates his opposition to a business program for the Government.

When the history of the financial legislation of the two sessions of this Congress is written high place will be given to the earnest effort, the intelligence, and the business judgment by which the Republican Congress brought real economy in the Government service in face of determined opposition from the Executive and the departments under him.

I shall append as a part of my remarks three other tables designated as Exhibits C, D, and E. Exhibit C is a statement of the appropriations made during the second session of this Congress comparing those appropriations with the estimates submitted. Exhibit D is a statement showing the details of the appropriations set forth in Exhibit C, showing more in detail the appropriations carried in the various acts. Exhibit E is a statement of the appropriations classified to show the principal objects for which the appropriations have been made.

River and Harbor Appropriations.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JAMES A. REED,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Thursday, April 22, 1920.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I realize that the Senate is worn out with months of arduous and almost unbroken toil, and that it is impossible to arrest the attention of the body to any matter so small and inconsequential as the internal improvement of the United States.

For days we have been considering the most important questions with less than a dozen Members present. When the question of a lack of a quorum is raised, Members come in and answer to their names and immediately retire. I am not disposed to harsh criticism.

Under the circumstances I almost despair of accomplishing anything looking toward an improvement in the river and harbor bill, but I shall endeavor to arrest the attention of the Senate so far as possible.

I shall try to convince it that the rivers and harbors appropriations ought to be greatly increased.

Mr. President, the most curious body in the world is the Congress of the United States. It is at times as hysterical as a nervous woman. Suddenly seized by a strange impulse, it will dispose of the public revenues as recklessly as it might if dollars were but the leaves of trees and we owned the forests of the world. Just as suddenly the Congress is seized with a spirit of economy, and each Member sharpens his knife and begins financial "cheeseparing." Ninety-nine times out of the hundred both processes result in a waste of the people's money. Parsimony frequently is the worst kind of wastefulness.

A man who is too economical to apply a patch to his roof has saved the price of the patch, but loses the value of a house. One day we act like so many "Scottys," fresh from the alkali deserts, sowing the people's money to the winds. The next day we imitate the miser who hoards pennies while starving soul and body.

Congressional inconsistency has been sharply illustrated in this present Congress. The estimate for 1921 for the Army is $983,122,120; for fortifications, $117,927,330; for the Military Academy, $6,778,637.50; making a total of $1,107,828,087.20.

The estimate for the Navy is $582,631,254.80.

The estimates for the sundry civil bill containing amounts chargeable to the Military and Naval Establishments are $42,455,959.71, making a total of $1,732,915,291.71.

These demands will be somewhat reduced, but nevertheless the expenditures authorized will be appalling. They will not be fully shown by the amounts named in the respective bills, because large unexpended balances will be used. We make these appropriations without batting an eye. It is impossible to stop them. The naval appropriation is greater than that made by England for her enormous fleet. It is, indeed, greater, in my opinion, than any annual appropriation ever made by Great Britain in time of war.

The amount that we are asked to expend upon our Army can be appreciated when we remember that Germany in 1907 only spent for her entire army $200,000,000; in 1908, $200,000,000; in 1909, $200,000,000, and similar amounts were expended in 1910 and 1911. In 1912, $230,000,000, and even in 1913, when they were undoubtedly preparing for war, their entire army cost but $360,000,000.

Mr. President, I favor an Army of reasonable strength and I advocate the construction of a strong Navy. However, I regard an Army of 300,000 men as too large.

But the same gentlemen who with cheerful recklessness appropriate these vast sums of money for the Army and the Navy are shocked into a state of indescribable parsimony the moment they are asked to spend a dollar to improve the great natural highways of the country.

Every dollar spent for the Army or Navy is a dollar that ceases to produce. It is paid out for the national defense; some of it is necessary, possibly all of it. I do not pause to argue that question, but I point to the fact that money so expended is forever gone. It never reproduces itself. There is a vast distinction between that kind of expenditure and one which is in its nature an investment. If a man borrows $10,000 and expends that $10,000 in having a good time, he is $10,000 in debt and he must pay it back from his future earnings; but if a man borrows $10,000 and with it establishes a successful business, he has not in fact gone into debt, he has made an investment. What I am asking Congress to do is to expend some money that will bring back to the people of the United States in an increase of the wealth of the United States as a whole probably a hundred or a thousand times the amount greater than the money appropriated; but when asked to appropriate three or four or five million dollars for such a purpose the economists of the Senate are aroused and alarmed, although they will add a hundred million dollars to a military or naval appropriation bill with cheerful alacrity.

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator state to what amendment he is speaking?

Mr. REED. I am speaking of an amendment to raise the general appropriation of the river and harbor bill from the amount reported by the committee of $20,000,000 to $27,000,000. The amount ought to be raised to $100,000,000. I will state, for the benefit of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House reported a bill simply appropriating a lump sum of $12,000,000 for all the rivers and harbors of the United States. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate raised that amount to $20,000,000. In a moment I will try to explain the reason for these remarkably low figures.

Mr. President, returning to my theme, if the commerce of Pittsburgh can reach the sea by water at a greatly reduced cost, the money that is used for the benefit of that commerce to remove obstructions in the rivers or harbors of the country returns itself to the country many times over. It is not waste; it is not extravagance, except it be improvidently employed. With that preliminary observation, I wish to direct attention to the peculiar situation presented by the pending river and harbor bill.

Until we entered the war with Germany, or until that war had so disturbed conditions that everything in the United States was abnormal, we regularly passed river and harbor bills in this country appropriating to each particular enterprise a specific amount of money with which to do a certain work.

Because of the stress of the war, temporarily the policy was adopted of passing appropriation bills carrying a blanket sum and leaving it to the engineers to expend that sum upon various projects as their judgment indicated. Of course, during the war and during the period when all world conditions were disturbed, when labor could scarcely be obtained, and prices were extortionate, according to our then standards, the appropriation was cut. The fact that it was then cut ought to be a reason for making up the shortage now, but instead of that it is given the force of a precedent and is now employed as an argument to show that the rivers and harbors of the country need but little money.

Let me call attention to former appropriations. I shall not go back a great period of time, but in 1908 we appropriated $43,500,000—I omit the odd figures—in 1909, $18,000,000, the smallest appropriation for some considerable period; in 1910 the appropriation was $29,000,000; in 1911, $49,000,000; in 1912, $30,000,000; in 1913, $41,000,000; and in 1914, $51,000,000. Then we entered the period of the war disturbance, and in 1915 our appropriations were cut to $26,989,000; in 1916, we appropriated $33,982,000; in 1917, ———; in 1918, we appropriated $20,000,000; in 1919 we appropriated $21,000,000.

With the war over, the House of Representatives proceeds to cut the appropriation to $12,000,000. The methods employed in an attempt to justify this remarkable figure are interesting. The engineers first reported that they needed $44,000,000.

The amount was to be used almost entirely upon approved projects which had been partially completed and which, speaking broadly, were each in the condition of a house half built, subject to destruction by the elements, and not yet fit for habitation.

A demand was made upon the engineers that they reduce their estimate. Under the coercion of this demand, as I recollect it, the figures they reported were cut to $33,000,000. If I am not mistaken, a second demand was made, and this time of a more peremptory character. They were asked not how much they needed, but to state the lowest cent they could possibly get along with. They then reported that if they were forced to do so, they could get along with $29,000,000.

Every one of those reductions was made in response to this sort of demand: "We want an estimate from you giving not what you think ought to be done, not what you think the country's demands require, not what you think proper economy and a regard for the spirit of progress and development require, but what is the least you can get through with, neglecting everything that can be neglected." That is the true spirit and import of those demands; in other words, the policy was to choke internal improvements to death. It was the very antithesis of a broad policy of internal development and improvement.

Now, after the thumbscrews had been applied in this way and in response to their pressure, the War Department cut down these figures. As an illustration of the methods of getting at this question, I am going to cite—and I do so without meaning any offense or criticism—the letter of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, of which I have the honor to be a very undistinguished member. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] wrote—and he has very frankly incorporated the letter in the report of the committee—to Col. Taylor, who was then Acting Chief of Engineers, under date of April 2, 1920:

> MY DEAR COLONEL: Our committee has decided to adhere to the policy of the House bill making appropriations for river and harbor work by a lump sum. We have not yet passed upon the amount, but in an informal discussion it was suggested that certain items covered in your list of revised estimates could be omitted without doing anything more than causing a delay in the final completion of the projects.

That is a pretty serious matter—delaying the final completion of a necessary project. Then the Senator went on to say:

> I would like you to state as soon as possible what injury to commerce or the projects involved and what other (if any) ill consequences would result from, and what objections you would urge against, making the following reductions, with reference to the items named, to wit:
> East River and Hell Gate, reduce to $1,000,000.

The engineers have estimated, as I recall, for $2,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They estimated for $3,100,000.

Mr. REED. But the chairman of the committee says there was an informal conference, and that informal conference, I presume, he takes as his authority for the letter; I do not know who was at that conference——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was a regular meeting of the committee. What I really referred to in the letter quoted by the Senator was that we discussed informally the amount that we thought we might put in the bill. We did not discuss the bill for the purpose of deciding the amount; as a matter of fact, the meeting of the committee was called for the express purpose of determining what the policy would be in framing the bill, and it was generally understood that at that meeting we would not pass upon the amount that would be included in the bill; but after we had determined the policy, that is, that we would adhere to the lump-sum proposition, then we proceeded in an informal way to discuss the different items, and it was suggested by some of the Senators that certain items could be left out, as indicated in the letter to Col. Taylor, and I was requested to write to the Chief of Engineers for the information requested in the letter. That is what I mean by an informal conference.

Mr. REED. That is to say, some member of the committee said, "I wonder if we could not leave out a certain item," and you sent a letter then in which you made that suggestion to the Board of Engineers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Several of the items were discussed, and several of them were brought up, and the situation with reference to them pointed out, wherein, in the testimony of Col. Taylor before the House committee, it was brought out with reference to these projects that if the money was not made available the only result would be a delay in the completion, for instance, of the East River project at New York. Col. Taylor testified expressly before the House committee that the expenditure of that money would not give them any increased facilities for commerce, that all it would do would be to bring the completion of the work that much nearer; and then Senators pointed out several other projects where the same situation existed.

Mr. REED. But, going back to the statement the Senator has just made, when the work was completed there would be a great addition to commercial advantage?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, certainly; and I am not arguing the matter. I am merely stating to the Senator the facts as they were in the committee. Then several other projects were mentioned as standing upon the same basis, and the projects that I mentioned in the letter were the ones that were especially mentioned and talked about. I was requested, as chairman of the committee, and I think it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that it was very proper, to call for this information from the engineers, and pursuant to that request of the committee I wrote the letter as I did.

Mr. REED. I do not criticize the Senator for writing the letter; but, nevertheless, the attitude in which the committee places itself by this letter is this: Although all these projects have been approved, and many of them have been approved for many years, although they have been solemnly adopted by the Congress as permanent plans, and although money has been appropriated for them, and although a failure to appropriate money now postpones the day of their completion and deprives the country of their benefit, nevertheless, if you can possibly figure out that the work can stand still and not be destroyed if we stop now, that is what we want to do. In other words, this committee proposes to stop internal improvements in the United States, to reverse the policy of all previous Congresses, and to play the niggardly act of saving a few dollars at the expense of the millions of people of this country. That is where we come to, and we might as well talk about it in plain English.

How easily and readily this informal conference disposed of important projects. Let me read them. These are the ones that the engineers were asked if they could not omit:

East River and Hell Gate——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hardly think the Senator ought to say that that is the way we proposed to dispose of these projects. The committee really was seeking for information with reference to these projects, and we wanted that information so that it would be available when the committee met for the purpose of passing formally upon the amount that we should include in the bill, and we did not meet for that purpose until we got the letter.

Mr. REED. But the Senate committee, according to the Senator, was not meeting for the purpose of carrying out great projects, but for the purpose, if possible, of stopping every one of them that it could stop, provided the only calamity to be visited was that the work would be postponed for a certain length of time. In other words, the Senate committee got an idea into its head, and the House committee did, that they were going to make a great showing of economy on the river and harbor bill, and they were working to that end. Instead of working toward the idea of developing the resources of this country and making it great and prosperous, and spending some money to do it, which had been our past policy, they propose now to cut the appropriation to the very bone. Now, really, that is the fact.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I expected to discuss that phase of the matter a little later, and I will do so in my own time and not interrupt the Senator to do so now.

Mr. REED. Now, let me read some more of these projects; and as I go along—for I shall take my time in discussing this matter—what is the East River and Hell Gate appropriation? It is true that it can wait. It can wait forever. The rocks that are there were put there by the Almighty many centuries ago, but every moment we leave them there they are an embargo to the commerce of the United States. They cost money every minute they are left there, because every obstruction to commerce is expensive. Of course, we can wait, but we shall pay for waiting. I continue reading from the letter:

Shrewsbury River, omit entirely.
Delaware River, reduce to $1,000,000.

I am not going into the merits of these matters, but let us look at the Delaware River. That mighty stream has upon its banks to-day the greatest shipbuilding plant in the world. It is owned by the United States. There are several private shipyards and a large number of other enterprises. It carries an immense commerce. Of course, that commerce "can wait"; it can also dwindle; it can die. A man can wait for a meal of victuals for 40 days, if he is able-bodied and has plenty of water to drink—at least, that was accomplished once—but it is not a very good thing for his physical development.

Let us see what the engineers replied to that:

Delaware River: The appropriation recommended in Col. Taylor's memorandum is $2,000,000. The reduction proposed is $1,000,000.

The project for the improvement of the Delaware River from Philadelphia to the sea provides for a channel 35 feet in depth at mean low water. The present controlling depth is 30 feet. The commerce of this port is approximately 25,000,000 tons per year, valued at over $2,000,000,000. An important navy yard is located near the head of the channel. The earliest possible completion of this project is regarded as of utmost importance to the great commerce. With a view to pressing the completion, a large amount of plant, including the dredge Corozal acquired from the Panama Canal, has recently been secured. To utilize this plant it will be necessary to purchase certain additional accessories, including a rehandling dredge for disposing of the material dredged by the Corozal. The cost of maintaining the plant in idleness would be a large sum.

The condition of the appropriations is now such that the department is seriously considering the rejection of a most advantageous bid for the execution of a large amount of necessary new work in Philadelphia Harbor. With the amount of $1,000,000 only, in addition to the amount which could be allotted from a lump-sum appropriation of $5,000,000 for the maintenance of all the harbors in the United States, it would be necessary to seriously curtail operations during the coming summer. The United States would suffer a considerable financial loss in the expenditures necessary for the care of idle plant, and the development of the commerce of the port would suffer great injury. The reduction proposed is considered most undesirable.

Now, of course, you can stop work, and you can let every ship that comes in there that draws 35 feet be compelled to lighter its cargo, and you can keep commerce out of our ports, and you can save a million dollars temporarily to the Government and cause an expenditure or loss to the people of ten times that amount. Of course, you can do that; but is it wise? On the other hand, is it not the highest wisdom to open that great port, and make it so that the heaviest seagoing craft can carry their cargoes directly to the wharves? Can there be any question about what is the policy of wisdom in a case of that kind? While you are expending money for your Navy and your Army by the hundreds of millions, remember that quite as important as the ships of the Navy are the harbors within which those vessels are to rest. Quite as important as the ships of commerce are the harbors where those ships may load and unload. It is a niggardly and it is a contemptible policy.

The cheese-knife economist is very busy. He was particularly busy over in the House of Representatives. There was a gentleman over there, the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee, who, I think, thought he had to pay this money out of his own pocket, and he imagined that what he did not save everybody else was going to waste. But there was another committee—we might as well fix responsibility—there was a partisan steering committee which gave its direction and orders. The orders were to cut down the expenditures, so that the Republican orators would have something to talk about in the campaign; and accordingly we find that the interests of the United States are to be sacrificed in the interests of a political campaign. The orders went forth, "Cut down Agricultural appropriations," "Cut down river and harbor appropriations," "Do a little cheeseparing," so that some leather-lunged gentlemen may stand upon the platforms in the next campaign and shout about the wonderful economy practiced by a Republican majority.

I have not had much to say about politics in this Chamber for a good while, but if the Republican Party is going to celebrate its return to power by the assassination of enterprise and progress in this country, it will not stay in power very long. If it follows the advice of a steering committee appointed to reduce appropriations on the things that are not really expenditures at all, but in the nature of investments bringing returns, it ought not to stay in power an hour.

Let us go a litle further in these things which were asked to be omitted:

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, omit entirely—

Says this letter.

Norfolk Harbor, omit entirely.

The answer to that came with crushing force:

The vigorous prosecution of the work of enlarging the channel is considered highly essential.

Savannah Harbor, omit entirely.

Let me read the report on that. Let me show the character of things they are trying to have taken out entirely from this appropriation. By that you get the spirit of the committee. The reply of the Chief of Engineers on that is as follows:

The appropriation presented in Col. Taylor's memorandum was $300,000. Your letter proposes to omit this item entirely. The project provides for a channel 30 feet deep across the bar and 26 feet deep to the main wharves. The present controlling depths are considerably less, and the important commerce of this port is suffering material injury from the lack of channel facilities. It has been found necessary to allot funds from the general item provided in the last act in order to carry on the work now under way. The omission of the item contained in Col. Taylor's memorandum is considered inadvisable.

Of course, you can let that bar stay there; you can shut Savannah off from the sea in part; you can compel the lighterage of goods; you can do all that, and you can save what? A few dollars temporarily, for some day that improvement will go on, because the country must continue to improve.

I shall not read all of this—Norfolk Harbor, Charleston Harbor, Savannah Harbor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator before him the statistics showing the amount of commerce at Savannah?

Mr. REED. I have not them with me. I could readily get them.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is very large, especially the foreign commerce.

Mr. REED. What difference does it make if commerce is throttled, provided a few votes can be gotten, and what difference does it make about the South? It is going Democratic, anyhow. I presume, therefore, you are regarded as not entitled to much consideration.

Brunswick Harbor, omit entirely.
Hillsboro Bay, omit entirely.
Southwest Pass, reduce to $600,000.
Mississippi River, Missouri River to St. Paul, reduce to $600,000.
Missouri River, omit entirely.
Cumberland River below Nashville, omit entirely.
Ohio River locks and dams, omit entirely.
Milwaukee Outer Harbor, omit entirely.
Rouge River, omit entirely.

The concluding part of the letter from the chairman of the committee is:

If we should increase the House sum to $15,000,000, what provision of the revised list would you likely omit in the use of such sum; and if we were to raise this amount to $18,000,000, what projects would likely be omitted in the use of this sum?

Mr. President, along with this letter, I am going to ask to have printed the reply of the Chief of Engineers.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, April 5, 1920.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: 1. In reply to your letter of April 2, requesting a statement as to what consequences would result from making certain reductions in the items presented by Col. Taylor in the memorandum submitted to your committee giving the appropriations necessary to carry on work of existing projects, I have the honor to submit the following remarks concerning those projects as to which the reductions proposed would have the most serious consequences.

2. Delaware River: The appropriation recommended in Col. Taylor's memorandum is $2,000,000. The reduction proposed is $1,000,000.

3. The project for the improvement of the Delaware River from Philadelphia to the sea provides for a channel 35 feet in depth at mean low water. The present controlling depth is 30 feet. The commerce of this port is approximately 25,000,000 tons per year, valued at over $2,000,000,000. An important navy yard is located near the head of the channel. The earliest possible completion of this project is regarded as of utmost importance to the great commerce. With a view to pressing the completion, a large amount of plant, including the dredge Corozal acquired from the Panama Canal, has recently been secured. To utilize this plant it will be necessary to purchase certain additional accessories, including a rehandling dredge for disposing of the material dredged by the Corozal. The cost of maintaining the plant in idleness would be a large sum.

4. The condition of the appropriations is now such that the department is seriously considering the rejection of a most advantageous bid for the execution of a large amount of necessary new work in Philadelphia Harbor. With the amount of $1,000,000 only, in addition to the amount which could be allotted from a lump-sum appropriation of $5,000,000 for the maintenance of all the harbors in the United States, it would be necessary to seriously curtail operations during the coming summer. The United States would suffer a considerable financial loss in the expenditures necessary for the care of idle plant, and the development of the commerce of the port would suffer great injury. The reduction proposed is considered most undesirable.

5. Norfolk Harbor: The appropriation recommended in Col. Taylor's memorandum is $750,000. The entire omission of this item is suggested in your letter. The project for the improvement of this harbor provides in its main feature for a channel 40 feet in depth to the navy yard. The Navy Department has recently completed, it is understood, a dry dock at the head of this channel capable of receiving the largest ships, and the entire capacity of the project channel is necessary for the proper utilization of this dry dock. With the available funds and under existing contracts, it is expected to secure a channel 40 feet in depth, but the width of this channel is insufficient for its proper utilization. The vigorous prosecution of the work of enlarging the channel is considered highly essential. The funds on hand are insufficient to undertake this enlargement, and the omission of the item presented would be highly inadvisable.

6. Savannah Harbor: The appropriation presented in Col. Taylor's memorandum was $300,000. Your letter proposes to omit this item entirely. The project provides for a channel 30 feet deep across the bar and 26 feet deep to the main wharves. The present controlling depths are considerably less, and the important commerce of this port is suffering material injury from the lack of channel facilities. It has been found necessary to allot funds from the general item provided in the last act in order to carry on the work now under way. The omission of the item contained in Col. Taylor's memorandum is considered inadvisable.

7. Southwest Pass: The appropriation proposed in Col. Taylor's memorandum for the passes at the mouth of the Mississippi River was $1,600,000. The reduction proposed in your letter is $1,000,000, leaving an item of $600,000.

8. The project for the improvement of Southwest Pass, for which this item is intended, provides for a channel 1,000 feet wide and 35 feet deep to afford an increase in the channel depth secured through the existing channel at South Pass. The problem which must be solved at this point is a most difficult one, both on account of the enormous quantities of silt to be handled, and also on account of the fact that the banks are so soft, being recent deposits. The channel has been open with required project depth more than once, but the deposit of silt or diversion of the current has as frequently reduced the depth, sometimes being as little as 16 feet. The securing of full project depth at this point is regarded as of the utmost importance, because the entire ocean-borne commerce from the Mississippi is now compelled to pass through South Pass, and an accident to a steamship in this narrow pass might entirely block the outlet of the Mississippi River and close the port of New Orleans. The prosecution of the project was recently reported on by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, which found that success could be secured only by the most vigorous prosecution of the jetty work now in progress. The interruption of the work would have most serious consequences, and a full amount of the item is considered essential to the proper prosecution of this needed improvement.

9. Cumberland River below Nashville: The appropriation presented in Col. Taylor's memorandum was $300,000. The entire omission of this item is proposed in your letter.

10. The project for the improvement of the Cumberland River below Nashville provides for the slack-water navigation by the construction of six locks and dams. The Government has built locks and dams to maintain navigation in the Cumberland River below Nashville and for some distance above Nashville. The two lowest locks and dams in the river have, however, not been completed and work is now in progress upon them. The result of this is that Nashville and the commerce of the Cumberland is not able to utilize the work already done because for several months of the year vessels are unable to enter the Cumberland from the Ohio during the low-water period. The city of Nashville has taken steps to provide excellent terminal facilities for purposes of handling the commerce by river and affording a most efficient transfer between water and rail. The completion of the two dams can not be accomplished with funds in hand and the $300,000 requested is absolutely necessary for this purpose. It is believed that this item should not be omitted under any circumstances.

11. Ohio River locks and dams: The appropriation presented in Col. Taylor's memorandum was $1,000,000. The entire omission of this item is proposed in your letter.

12. The project for the improvement of the Ohio River, to afford a navigable depth of 9 feet, is the largest comprehensive project of river and harbor improvement in this country. The work is now being actively prosecuted at 15 locks and dams, in part by contract and in part by United States plant and hired labor. The present appropriations have been reduced to such a low ebb that the reallotment of funds between the various works has been necessary to permit essential work to continue. The cessation of appropriations would disorganize the work and would be most disadvantageous to the United States. It is intended to apply a considerable portion of the sum recommended to the completion of the Emsworth Dam, which will replace the first two dams below Pittsburgh. The present structures, built many years ago, are in extremely bad repair and may break at any moment. The sum recommended is regarded as the minimum necessary for the economical prosecution of this project.

13. Commerce is endeavoring to utilize the Ohio River as rapidly as the work of the Government in building locks and dams will permit, and it is believed that this most important project on which so many business interests of the central part of the country depend should be pushed at as rapid a rate of progress as is possible. The million dollars requested in this bill is sufficient to keep the work of construction progressing at a proper rate, but if omitted would cause a cessation of work which would be not only most expensive to the United States on account of disorganization of forces and care of plant, but would also greatly interfere with important and large business interests which are making all preparations to utilize the improvement as it progresses. It is believed that this item should be retained whatever else may be omitted.

14. The omission of the remaining items will delay the prosecution of important and worthy improvements, but will not have the serious consequences incident to the omission of the items on which the above statements have been made.

15. It is difficult to predicate the works that would be omitted were the total amount appropriated, $18,000,000 or $15,000,000, respectively. By omitting those items indicated in your letter on which no comment is made herein, and by the omission of work on some of the smaller items of less importance to general commerce, the expenditures could be brought within the limit of $18,000,000. The department would be hard put to it to carry on with an appropriation of $15,000,000 the work essential to commerce.

Very truly, yours,

LANSING H. BEACH,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

Mr. REED. All of these propositions except a few were turned down for reasons which were of overmastering importance. I call to your attention the conclusion as stated in paragraph 14:

14. The omission of the remaining items will delay the prosecution of important and worthy improvements, but will not have the serious consequences incident to the omission of the items on which the above statements have been made.

So it is proposed now in Congress to omit items which will delay the prosecution of important and worthy improvements, and all for the purpose of cutting this appropriation bill some $5,000,000, with the full knowledge that every one of these projects must ultimately go on. It is not to save $5,000,000 but to temporarily avoid expending that sum. Then, when we come to expend it, we will find, as the engineers' evidence clearly shows, that the work which has been allowed to remain in an uncompleted condition will have deteriorated to an enormous extent, and a great loss will have resulted.

What are some of these projects we were asked to omit for this political reason? I am protesting to Republicans, because they are in the majority and responsible on this matter, not to adopt this retrogressive policy, and I say to you that I will go bond you will not make any votes by the miserable device. I can go out myself in the river States and talk enough about you to take more votes than you will ever get by the trick you seek to perpetrate.

The American people can not be fooled by such shams. Nobody will be fooled by it, and nobody will listen to it. When you can appropriate a hundred million dollars for the benefit of Europe—I am not complaining about it—and when you can be so careless as not to follow it up to see whether it went to feed armies or went to feed women and children; when you can find the President and Mr. Hoover and the other great men of this earth boldly proposing that we shall lend $5,000,000,000 more to Europe to resuscitate her failing commercial energies; and when you can find this all accepted by many people, much of it accomplished, and no complaint, you are not going to attract much favorable attention by cutting $5,000,000 off of the river and harbor bill when by so doing you greatly injure the internal prosperity of America.

I am informed that the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, after going over this matter, in this spirit of new economy, which consists in arresting development, agreed that $24,500,000 was an irreducible minimum. Then the steering committee came around and had an interview with them, and they reduced the irreducible minimum to $12,000,000. It is a delectable example of statesmanship.

What are these improvements, in a general way, many of which we were asked to have stricken from the bill?

The Mississippi River has been approved as a great watercourse, and as the proper object of governmental protection and improvement, since 1908. There has not been in that long time a respectable engineer of this or any other country who has dared deny the navigability of that stream or its importance to the commerce of this land. But the chairman of the committee did not hesitate to wet his thumb and wipe it out, as a boy wipes out the figures on his slate. I do not mean the chairman of the committee alone. I suppose he and his conferees were acting under the inspiration of this remarkable thing known as a steering committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I hope the Senator is not referring to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate and to the chairman of that committee?

Mr. REED. Yes; I am.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say to the Senator that I have had no communication, orally or otherwise, with the steering committee of the House of Representatives, and I have not been controlled in my action by their request or their action in the slightest way.

Mr. REED. What does control the Senator? What causes him to assist in arresting the development of projects that have been before the country and have been approved, some of them, for over a hundred years?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I expect to state that in my own time.

Mr. REED. I have been waiting for the Senator to make that speech. The bill is about to pass.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is mistaken. The Senator knew that this amendment was passed over, and it was expected that it would be discussed, and I expected to discuss it at the very first opportunity. I did try to set out pretty fully and frankly in the report of the committee the basis for the action of the committee, and I think the Senator, if he will be fair—and I believe he intends to be fair—will admit that I did set out fully and frankly the facts with reference to the matter.

Mr. REED. Of course, if I can not find out the reason for condemning these projects which have been here for over a hundred years, I shall have to wait until the Senator takes the floor; but I did want to have the benefit of his advice on this matter; and I found the bill about to pass, and it was necessary for me to talk. I suppose the Senator is entitled to a closing, anyway, and I make no question about that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say to the Senator that I have not been withholding with the idea of getting the closing, because, as a matter of fact, I agree very largely with many suggestions made by the Senator. But the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] had offered an amendment making the amount $24,000,000, and he had started to discuss it, and I suppose he would like to finish that discussion. The Senator from Missouri wanted to begin his discussion, and so I did not try to get the floor.

Mr. REED. The Senator has been very courteous to me personally, and I thank him for it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I certainly want to be perfectly fair with reference to this matter, because I am seeking the same end, in a way, the Senator is. As I said, I shall not disagree with many of the suggestions and statements which the Senator has made, and it was upon his suggestions and statements very largely that I urged $20,000,000 in the committee, despite the opinions of several other members of the committee of my own party, who wanted a much lower sum.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I have called attention to these important items of the bill, projects that have been approved, some of them for over a century, projects of the greatest importance. No one can say anything about pork with reference to them. The pork-barrel orator could not get a leg to stand on in criticising these items.

When I say "pork-barrel orator," I mean one of those gentlemen whose chief stock in trade is to go back home and say he stopped the pork barrel, and who then sits still and does not bat an eye when a bill goes through here carrying two or three hundred million dollars which does not give the United States any benefit commensurate with that contained in a bill of this kind.

Incidentally, and while I am speaking of that particular variety of political vermin, I notice now that there is going to be a heroic effort to stop sending out seeds, that somebody is going to save the country from bankruptcy by stopping the sending out of seeds. That will be the next grand rush for popularity.

Then some one will come along and will save a few cents printing some useful information in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the printing of his economy speech will cost the Government more money than he saves. Then the economist will flood his district with that speech in demonstration that he has saved the people's money. That is what I call the cheapest kind of political pettifogging. It is a terrible thing if some one wants to send to an old lady out in the country a package of improved tomato seed and she plants them and raises some tomatoes that are a little better than they had theretofore in that community and scatters the seed around and a few hundred families get it. That is a terrible thing, and the faker economist is ready to stop it. We ought to erect a hall of fame for that kind of economist. Then I would like to fix the niches, and I would make them about 3½ inches high and 1½ inches wide and I could put in them the life-size statue of any man whose title to fame rests upon that sort of economy.

But, Mr. President, I want to talk about this river and harbor bill from a different standpoint than this miserable pettifogging, cheeseparing position. I am going to discuss just the Mississippi River. Let others discuss the great waterways and harbors of their own State.

It was Daniel Webster who many years ago referred in language that was majestic and almost poetic to "the Mississippi River bearing upon her bosom the commerce of a continent." She is the mightiest stream of North America, draining the richest valley in all the world, binding to herself by her tributaries 32 American States embracing an empire of rich, arable land, shut off from direct contact with the sea, a territory eleven times as great as France and Germany combined, capable of sustaining a population of 400,000,000 souls. The Mississippi is the central artery to the heart of the United States.

Figures are dry, but let me give the Senate very briefly a few. The continent of North America, between the Republic of Mexico and the northern limits at which wheat, barley, and potatoes will ripen, embraces a territory of 5,130,000 square miles. Of this there lie in the Mississippi Valley and within the confines of the United States 2,765,000 square miles. In the Mississippi Valley it is estimated that there is of arable land a body almost as great as the whole of Europe, namely, 1,980,000 square miles.

The aggregate crop-bearing territory of the continent is only 3,140,000 square miles, of which the Atlantic frontier embraces only 610,000 square miles and the Pacific frontier only 555,000 square miles. The rest of crop-bearing North America is in the Mississippi Valley.

The gentleman who proposes to throttle that stream has some job on his hands, and the man who thinks he can make any votes by saving the few thousand dollars necessary to the development of that waterway is reckoning with a different constituency than I am acquainted with.

Away up at the north are the Twin Cities—St. Paul and Minneapolis—the glory of Minnesota. Half way down is St. Louis, the great metropolis of the Central West, through which flows east and west a commerce fully one-half of which ought to go to southern ports. Directly connected by the great Missouri are the two Kansas Cities with a combined population of 500,000 souls and a trade which reaches all parts of the world. At the southern extremity is New Orleans, once the second port of the United States. Up to the Civil War it controlled 38 per cent of all the sea commerce of the United States.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not think the Senator meant to infer that New Orleans is not now the second port of the United States. The latest reports clearly indicate that New Orleans is second only to New York in the volume and value of her exports and imports.

Mr. REED. That is due to some heroic work largely led by the Senator from Louisiana. I of course accord to others their full meed and share of praise.

But all along the mighty stream, from Lake Itasca to the Gulf, there are cities, towns, and villages of great importance. It counts as its tributaries the leading rivers of the continent. The mighty Missouri, bearing the melted snows of the Rockies, mingles her waters with the Mississippi upon the borders of my own State. The majestic Ohio, with its tributaries draining the most fertile lands of all the world, the Illinois, the Cumberland, the Red River, and other great streams join this central artery and constitute the avenues over which the commerce of the richest part of the world will ultimately go. It may be barred temporarily by a steering committee, it may be arrested for the time being by political obstacles, but I hope the chairman of the committee—and I am glad to have heard him say it—is not controlled by those motives. I hope he will rise a little higher and say that he does not propose to adhere to the policy that an improvement must stop if it is possible to stop it without absolutely ruining the country, for that is the policy of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad to say that I do not think I am animated by that policy. I tried to avoid that policy, at any rate, and I do not think the bill is based on that policy. I will say to the Senator that the bill does not go as far as I would like to have it go. I will say that frankly. But as the Senator knows, we do not have our way entirely in these matters.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will act with me and some more of us, we will have our way over here in the Senate, and then we will have to have it out with the House, and it may be the House will experience a change of heart.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We expect to have it out with the House. As to what the outcome will be, I can not say.

Mr. REED. I have obtained my idea of the Senator's position from the letter which stated, referring to the conference:

> It was suggested that certain items covered in your list of revised estimates could be omitted without doing anything more than causing a delay in the final completion of the projects.

That is to say, we would stop any work if the only result of stopping it was to delay it, but if there were other great injuries, then the project was to go on.

Mr. President, I desire to call attention now to the fact that the improvements on the Mississippi River embrace more than the mere matter of transportation upon the stream. There is, first, the question of flood damage. Enough money was lost in a single flood a few years ago to have improved the Mississippi River from its mouth to St. Louis, and every few years floods of the most devastating and horrible character are destroying property of inestimable value throughout the greater Mississippi Valley. It is not long since one of the principal manufacturing towns of the State of Ohio was almost wiped out by a flood which could have been prevented and that ought to have been prevented, although in that particular instance it lies, perhaps, outside the purview of this bill.

In connection with the general question of flood prevention is the question of overflow, which occurs substantially every year on large portions of this valley. The figures in this connection are astounding; they are so astounding that if they were not backed by distinguished engineers of civil life, as well as the Army engineers. I would hesitate to produce them. When I say to you that from Chicago to the Gulf there are 20,000,000 acres of land submerged or partially submerged every two or three years, so that a part of the land is substantially worthless and a part of it rendered of very slight value, I present a spectacle that ought to interest as well as alarm all the Members of the Senate. Contemplate the proposition—20,000,000 acres of Mississippi Valley land. Some of you Senators live in the East, although I do not think I see any eastern Senator in the Chamber at this moment; but let me tell you something: Upon the kind of land of which I am now speaking, once it is drained, such a thing as fertilizer is scarcely dreamed of or required. The soil is of wonderful depth. It was made by the wash of the mountains and of the plains through all the centuries. It is the cream, if I may use that expression with reference to the soil, that was skimmed off the surface of all the plains and mountains to the north. A great engineer, Lyman E. Cooley, has something to say on this question, and I should like to read a brief quotation from him:

> There are in the valley from Chicago to the Gulf of Mexico 32,000 square miles of land, more than 20,000,000 acres, subject to overflow. All but two or three thousand square miles of this land is south of Cairo in what is known as the delta region, and $90,000,000 of the estimate which has been made by the Board of Engineers are for revetments to hold the banks in order to conserve these lands and protect the levee system. When you take that out, less money is required to develop the Lakes-to-the-Gulf deep waterway than is required to develop the Ohio River for a depth of 9 feet.

He was speaking about a particular subject.

> This empire of alluvium is right here. Some of our people are going to the far West, some are going up into Canada, hunting for lands, and we have them at our doors—the richest in the world. We have 5,000 square miles of land in the State of Illinois that only require drainage or protection, an area greater than Connecticut, greater than Porto Rico—in Illinois alone. South of that we have this 20,000,000 acres of land.
> There was never cultivated in the best days of the Pharaohs in Egypt over 5,000,000 acres of land. Here, under a climate as favorable, are four Egypts between Cairo and the Gulf. Egypt in her best days carried 10,000,000 of population, as estimated by historians. By the same tokens this area will carry 40,000,000 of people.

And this is only a part of the land that can be claimed. A little further on this great engineer declares that the area of land that can be thus reclaimed is greater than all the arid lands of the West which are capable of irrigation.

That is the picture; and for Congress to arrest any movement looking toward the reclamation of a vast territory of that kind is a policy that is as mistaken and as unwise as it is to deny food to a growing animal. A wise ranchman never follows such a policy.

Mr. President, coming now to the narrower question of transportation, for the first time in many years that question is in a position where a solution can be reached, and just at that time we are asked to cut down the appropriation. What is the state of affairs? First, is the Mississippi navigable? Can it be so developed that it can be successfully navigated and money saved thereby? I do not propose to take the time to read from the reports.

It is sufficient to say that in the last century of time there is no engineer of respectability who has challenged the proposition that the Mississippi River can not only be made navigable for boats, but that it can be made to carry an immense commerce, and that such commerce can be carried at a less rate than it can be carried by rail. When, however, we present these views of engineers we are confronted by an argument that has been iterated and reiterated until my patience is threadbare listening to it. The argument is that the commerce is not now upon the stream, and because the commerce is not now upon the stream, therefore, argue these wise men, it will never be upon the stream. How can you put commerce on a stream until the stream is made navigable? You can not travel to a town if the bridges have not been built even though the rest of the road is good. You can not haul commerce over a river where there are sand bars at intervals over which your boat can not pass.

These gentlemen are simply in this situation: Here is a great stream. Between two important points there is a bar over which a boat can not pass. That exists for many years. We ask them to remove the bar, so that there may be commerce. They say, "We decline to remove the bar because there is not commerce running over the bar." It is the sum total, if I may employ the term, of illogical idiocy. You might as well say that you would never allow a railroad to be built because there was not commerce already moving over tracks that had not yet been laid, or that you would condemn a railroad enterprise because the railroad had not carried freight between two cities before bridges were built over the streams that must be crossed. That is the argument that I have often heard, but it is not an argument which appeals very strongly to men who think. The question is, Can the stream be made a great commerce carrier? Will it carry the commerce when the work is done, not before the work is done?

When you come to that test, sir, you can not find a respectable engineer in the United States who will not say that the Mississippi River, at least from St. Louis to the Gulf, can be made a mighty carrier of commerce, and that many of the tributary streams can be similarly utilized. "But," says the steering committee, "let us save a few million dollars and lose a few hundred million dollars to the country. Let us go out on the stump and proudly acclaim this new Republican financial policy. Let us in one hand present the bills which dispose of American dollars as though they were as thick as leaves"—as I said a while ago—"and let us in the other present a bill showing economy practiced at the expense of the country's development." That is a poor campaign slogan. It will get you about two votes in the United States.

Mr. Cooley, this great engineer I have quoted, declares that once the Mississippi River is properly harnessed and dams built at two points which he certifies will develop 1,000,000 horsepower, it will have probably 20 to 28 feet from St. Louis to the Gulf. Moreover, these dams will control the waters in their most turbulent portions, make the commerce move easily, and dispose of many other obstacles to boats. The Army engineers have all, in one way or another, sanctioned these statements. I know of nothing to the contrary. Board after board has met, survey after survey has been taken, plan after plan has been discussed and developed. The only trouble has been that we have proceeded by piecemeal instead of by wholesale.

I now direct your attention to the fact that the Government during the war, at a very considerable expense, undertook to relieve the congested condition of commerce by building fleets of boats to operate upon the Mississippi and the Warrior Rivers. The Government moved slowly; it generally does; but in this instance its efforts were retarded by war conditions, by the inability to withdraw steel and other materials from the uses which the war was compelling. The result of all that is that we now find they have acquired a fleet of boats operating upon the Warrior River, and those boats, we are told, have been a failure. I deny it. They have already, with inefficient wharves, operating for a long time without proper cooperation with railroad connections, operating to a large extent with experimental machinery or with machinery that was not built especially for that business, nevertheless reached a point where the enterprise is practically paying.

From a letter written by Capt. John S. Pratt I quote the following:

As to the future prospects for the successful operation of inland waterways activities, you are advised that it is my belief that operations on the New York Barge Canal can probably be made self-sustaining this year. At least all indications would point to that possibility. It is also believed that operations on the Warrior River may be made self-sustaining by the end of the calendar year 1921. I am not so optimistic in regard to operations on the lower Mississippi. I am of the opinion that it will probably take at least two years, and possibly a longer time, to place operations on the lower Mississippi on a paying basis.

The principal reasons for the longer time required in the development of the Warrior River and Mississippi River sections may be briefly summarized as follows:

(a) The old-type, inefficient floating equipment utilized during the past period of operations.

(b) Inadequate terminal facilities.

(c) The tariff fabric (joint rail and water rates) covering operations in these sections has only been recently completed. It still requires further development to include certain other sections of the country.

(d) The establishment of joint railroad and water interchange points.

(e) The project is entirely new and, like all other large investments and installations, requires a considerable period of time for development—

And so forth.

The engineer then proceeds to deal with the question of what is necessary to be done in order to make river transportation a success, but the whole purport of his letter is that there are no difficulties of an insurmountable nature.

As to the Mississippi—I am speaking of what we call the lower Mississippi, from St. Louis down—the Government acquired or ordered 40 steel barges, 6 steel tugboats, and 1 steel terminal barge. It purchased certain other equipment, a list of which I will put in the RECORD, and it chartered certain other boats; but of these 40 new steel barges especially adapted to that river, only 15 have been delivered. The rest are about ready for delivery. So that you have for the first time under contract and being completed a good equipment, an up-to-date equipment, for service upon this river. At a time like that, is it wise not to expend the money necessary to take the bars from the river and to protect the banks? Manifestly, it is the height of unwisdom.

On the upper Mississippi the Government has proceeded by the ordering of 19 steel barges. On April 1 of this year 14 of these barges had been launched. Four were under construction on the ways. I shall put in a letter showing the condition of this construction.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UPPER RIVER.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, April 21, 1920.

Memorandum for Hon. JAMES A. REED, United States Senate.

1. Under an allotment from the emergency shipping fund made by the President for the construction of barges and towboats for the upper Mississippi River, contracts have been entered into for the construction of 19 steel barges and 4 steel-hull towboats.

2. On April 1, 1920, 14 of the barges had been launched, 4 were under construction on the ways, and material for the remaining 1 was being collected. The average completion of all the barges was 88.64 per cent. The barges are being constructed under three separate contracts, as follows:

One with the Dravo Contracting Co., Pittsburgh, for 6 barges, of which 3 are 100 per cent completed, one 99 per cent completed, one 95 per cent completed, and one 80 per cent completed.

One with the Marietta Manufacturing Co. for 6 barges, of which 2 are 99 per cent completed, one 95 per cent completed, one 93 per cent completed, one 92 per cent completed, and one 72 per cent completed.

One with the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Works, Dubuque, Iowa, for 7 barges, of which 2 are 99 per cent completed, 2 are 95 per cent completed, one 85 per cent completed, one 48 per cent completed, and one 38 per cent completed.

3. The barges will cost approximately $110,000 each, and will carry, fully loaded, on a draft of 7 feet, 2,000 tons each.

4. One of the barges constructed by the Marietta Manufacturing Co. and one by the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Works were delivered in the fall of 1919, and towed by a self-propelled river dredge from St. Paul to St. Louis, each loaded with 650 tons of ore. The boats on this trip drew approximately 4 feet of water and the towboat 4½ feet. The trip was made without special difficulty or incident.

5. The towboats are being constructed under a joint contract entered into by the Marietta Manufacturing Co., Minneapolis Steel & Machinery Co., and the St. Louis Boat & Engineering Co. The cost of these towboats, including the contract work, the designs, drawings, inspections, etc., to be furnished by the United States, will be approximately $375,000 each. These boats have approximately 1,800 horsepower and will draw 4½ feet when in service. On April 1 the work on these boats was approximately 15 per cent completed. The contract calls for the delivery of the first boat April 27, 1920; the second, June 6, 1920; the third, July 16, 1920; and the fourth, August 25, 1920.

6. On account of the delays which have been experienced by severe winter conditions and the inability to obtain materials and difficulties with labor, the contract work on these boats has been greatly delayed, and they will not be completed until nearly the end of the season of 1920, if indeed they are completed at all during the present season, but undoubtedly the entire fleet of 4 towboats and 19 barges will be available for service in the spring of 1921.

7. The towboats are modern up-to-date boats of unusual power, and the barges have been especially designd for easy towing and handling in shallow channels, and the one experiment which has been made with the barges indicated that they were correctly designed to accomplish the purpose intended.

H. TAYLOR,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers.

Mr. REED. These barges cost the Government approximately $110,000 each. An experimental trip was made, and it was made with boats nothing like as efficient as this new equipment. That trip was entirely successful. That is on the upper Mississippi, where they haul barges containing 650 tons of ore with a draft of less than 4 feet of water. So that the proposition to throttle the Mississippi at a time like this is a proposition to destroy the very thing which the Government has been working for, and in which it has invested a large sum of money.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY I. EMERSON,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks I desire to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of an editorial printed in the Lakewood Press, as follows:

FAVORITE SONS.

The Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives is the most important committee in Congress for Cuyahoga County. It is recognized as one of the most influential committees on the entire list, and all cities having a frontage on the Great Lakes, on either the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans, or on any river are especially interested in its make-up. Not only the vast shipping interests of Cleveland but the commercial interests of the entire county are affected directly by the appropriations that are needed for the harbor, and for the dredging and straightening of the Cuyahoga River. Lakewood has a direct as well as an indirect interest in so far as the erection of the Lorain-Huron Bridge will be aided by the Federal appropriations for the river straightening.

Since the war started Congress has been compelled to stop almost completely appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. While the greatest economy must still be exercised, the necessities of Cleveland and other great lake ports must be recognized in the next Congress. Congressman EMERSON, as a member of the committee, was able to obtain an appropriation of $5,000 for a survey of the Cuyahoga River in the present Congress, and it is highly important that the largest possible appropriation be obtained in the next Congress for the purpose of carrying on this river work so vital to the business interests of the entire county as well as the city of Cleveland.

The personnel of the committee in the present Congress is as follows: Charles A. Kennedy, Iowa, chairman; Peter E. Costello, Pennsylvania; S. Wallace Dempsey, New York; Henry I. Emerson, Ohio; Henry Z. Osborne, California; Richard P. Freeman, Connecticut; Nathan L. Strong, Pennsylvania; Niels Juul, Illinois; Amos H. Radcliffe, New Jersey; Andrew J. Hickey, Indiana; Caleb R. Layton, Delaware; Israel M. Foster, Ohio; Earl C. Michener, Michigan; John H. Small, North Carolina; Charles F. Booher, Missouri; Thomas Gallagher, Illinois; Thomas J. Scully, New Jersey; Samuel M. Taylor, Arkansas; H. Garland Dupré, Louisiana; Clarence F. Lea, California; William E. Cleary, New York.

As will be noted, Congressman EMERSON is fourth on the list. The present chairman, Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, is not a candidate for reelection to the next Congress. The second man on the list, Mr. COSTELLO, of Pennsylvania, has just been defeated in the Republican primaries in that State and will not be returned. The rule of seniority is closely followed in making up these committees, and the return of Mr. EMERSON from the twenty-second district will insure that he will be either first or second man on the committee, a position that will practically insure he will be able to secure an appropriation for Cleveland Harbor and Cuyahoga River that the Federal engineers recommend. It is equally certain that no other man who might be sent from this district, however able, could in his first term secure the necessary influence; even if he was fortunate enough to obtain an appointment on the committee, he would be required to go to the bottom of the list. Under the most favorable conditions a Congressman is not able until his fourth or fifth term to aspire to the chairmanship of a committee of this importance.

It is because the South for a hundred years has held to the policy of retaining its experienced men in Congress year after year, until they attained influence and seniority claims, that the South has been able to shape legislation far more than the importance that section warranted. Naturally, in the past 50 years, whenever there has happened to be a Democratic majority in Congress, the South has secured practically the chairmanships of all the influential committees.

Congressman EMERSON filed his announcement of candidacy several weeks ago. No other candidate has yet filed, although several candidates have been reported as ready to enter the field. Under existing conditions, the Lakewood Press has declared frankly and unreservedly in favor of the renomination of the present Congressman. Not the least of the reasons that influences us is the knowledge that his return for a fourth term meant not only the approval of the patriotic American course he has displayed, but it meant the next Congressman from the twenty-second district would be either chairman or second man on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, a strategic position to obtain the necessary appropriations for the Cleveland Harbor and the Cuyahoga River. In this same connection this influential position will enable him to obtain the $500,000 appropriation of a Lakewood post office. It might be a quarter of a century before another man from this district will find himself in such a tactful position.

This is not a good year for "favorite sons." * * * We support HENRY I. EMERSON for Congress in this district. This is not the year for catering to the "favorite-son" idea, with so much at stake that will be inevitably lost if Mr. EMERSON is not reelected in the twenty-second district.

There are other issues to be discused later when the congressional campaign starts, but this one argument alone will be found as conclusive in the district against any "favorite son" in the congressional contest.

H. R. 14338.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST R. ACKERMAN,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, having been an employer of labor, both skilled and unskilled, for the past quarter of a century, I think I know something about work and wages. On the strength of this knowledge I have no hesitancy in saying there is not a class of workers in private or corporate employ as poorly paid as those now doing the very important work of the Post Office Department. Not only do they appear from all the facts submitted to be underpaid, but they are overworked because of the enormous amount of mail matter occasioned by the war and the department being necessarily short-handed.

I do not mean by this to admit that Congress is responsible for the present condition of the Postal Service. Perhaps a close scrutinization of the facts would show that no single agency is altogether chargeable. The Congress, however, has certain means by which limited corrective measures may be administered. The most important of these is in the question of equitable compensation.

We are all familiar with the causes and circumstances of living conditions and should not overlook the fact that they apply just as much to the public employee as to the private employee. The latter class have presented their cases to their employers and have been granted relief necessary to enable them to continue supplying the necessities and comforts of life. This bill just passed without a dissenting vote partially provided for one class of Government employees what other classes of workers were previously granted by their employers, but in my opinion it is not all that should be paid them; it seems, however, all that can be obtained at the present time.

I know of men who have been in the service for the better part of their lives who say they will be obliged to seek other employment unless increased remuneration above what has been given is granted. They have never been paid enough to be able to lay up much and have had to draw their scanty savings to live. In lieu of big wages they have been confidently looking forward to the Government's appreciation of faithful and long service in much the same manner as they would be rewarded by a pension from any other large employer, and now they have a reward by the enactment of the Lehlbach retirement bill.

It is frequently stated that the mail carriers and clerks should quit and go to work elsewhere if not satisfied with their present positions and salaries. It would be just as logical to tell a man who has worked for one of the big railroad systems of the country for a quarter of a century to sacrifice his seniority status by taking a job elsewhere for a couple of dollars more a month. The pensions and other prerequisites which come as the result of long and faithful service are all these men have to look forward to and are the only incentive to induce young men to enter this branch of the service.

The work of a post-office clerk requires skill, intelligence, endurance, and tact. Although from my youth I have personally been interested in the workings of the Post Office Department, I have never yet heard the Postal Service termed a fascinating employment in the sense that there was a real future to those engaging therein. To the letter carrier it is always the same thing. Day after day, year in and year out, rain or shine, sweltering in summer and battling the chill winds of winter, the mail man continues to go his rounds as a—

Messenger of sympathy and love,
Servant of parted friends,
Consoler of the lonely,
Bond of the scattered family,
Enlarger of the common life,
Carrier of news and knowledge,
Instrument of trade and industry,
Promoter of mutual acquaintance, of peace and good will among men and nations.

In the performance of these functions, the clerks who work through the long night hours sorting the mail in the swaying postal cars or report for duty hours ahead of the opening of the usual business day play no less an important part than the carrier who is the last medium of distribution or final link between correspondents.

There is no agency of the Government that comes into such close touch with the people as does the Post Office Department. There can be no politics in its administration, for the average individual looks for service when needing its functions, and they care not a whit what the politics of its employees are if they render efficient, faithful, and intelligent service.

The patriotism consistently shown by postal employees during the war, and their sustained cooperation with other governmental agencies, in a very large measure, indeed, contributed to the winning of the war. I need not dwell on their magnificent service in the sale of Liberty bonds and war-saving stamps. Neither is it necessary to more than merely refer to the numerous instances in which extra work was performed by clerks and carriers to fill the gaps in their ranks caused by many voluntary enlistments in the military service.

In 1886 the postal employees handled 3,474,000,000 pieces of mail. In 1904 the amount increased to 9,502,459,535. In 1913 that amount had been doubled, and continued to multiply until last year the task became so great that it was found necessary to abandon it in order to use the men and time on work of more urgent necessity. The cash receipts of the year, however, tell the story. They were, from all sources, $432,239,126.20 for 1919, $388,975,962.24 in 1918, $329,726,116 in 1917, $312,057,689 in 1916, and $287,248,165 in 1915. Of course, these figures include the 1 cent increase in postage while it was effective, but, nevertheless, an enormous increase in actual pieces of mail delivered to the people who pay the bill is also plainly apparent. If I know the heart of the American people, I do not believe that any one of them will object to paying for the extra service, and am convinced they should not.

National Revenues—Reduction of Taxation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM R. GREEN,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the Republican Congress which convened in December of last year took over the task of sustaining the financial needs of the Government under very difficult circumstances. The war, it is true, was over and had been over for a year, but a large portion of its debts were still not only unpaid but unsettled. The war had been carried on largely by sales of bonds, and one large issue had been made after the war was over. Besides this, when the revenue law of 1918, as it is called, although it was not passed until February, 1919, was finally revised it greatly reduced the taxes for the calendar year of 1919, which would be paid in 1920. This was done in anticipation of a great reduction in expenses following the war. The reduction occurred but was not so large as expected. Not only was the issue of Victory bonds made necessary, but there was outstanding $3,683,804,490 in short-time certificates of indebtedness on June 30, 1919. This amount had been reduced when the Republican Congress convened, but the Secretary of the Treasury still estimated there would be a deficit in the general fund on June 30, 1920, including whatever short-time certificates were then unpaid, of over $3,000,000,000.

The war had brought a great increase in our permanent and regular expenses. Before the European war the total expenses of carrying on the Government were about a billion dollars, including about $250,000,000 paid out for the Post Office Department, which was returned to the Treasury. Deducting this amount, the total expenses were only about $750,000,000 annually. Now the interest charge alone has been so increased by the enormous indebtedness created by the war that it is over a billion dollars annually. The war also required payments to the soldiers of the late war for compensation, insurance, the $60 bonus on discharge, hospitals, hospital service in the Public Health Service and the War Department, and the maintenance of a War Risk Bureau, having at one time nearly 15,000 employees, although it will be brought down by the Republican Congress to 5,000 or 6,000 at the close of this fiscal year on June 30. Besides this, the cost of living had so increased that the pensions granted to the Civil War and Spanish War veterans also had to be increased. No accurate estimate can be made of the total expenses on account of the last Great War and the former wars in the way of allowances to and expenses connected with the care of our soldiers, but it is safe to say that the total will be around a billion dollars.

In 1914 the expenses of our Military Establishment was only a little over $100,000,000. For the fiscal year of 1920, as nearly as can now be estimated, it will be over $800,000,000. This, of course, is caused by the large amount of war contracts which were settled and paid during this fiscal year and the expense of keeping our troops in Europe and elsewhere abroad, together with the expenses of demobilization and disposition of immense quantities of surplus material. In this connection it should be said that there is still to be paid on war contracts after July 1, 1920, large sums, the amount of which is not yet exactly determined. During the fiscal year 1920 it was also necessary to raise the wages and salaries of the employees of the Government in the lower grades, and this, in fact, had been provided for for the fiscal year of 1920 before the Republican Congress convened.

It is impossible here now to go into all of the details which caused the Secretary of the Treasury to estimate the expenditures for the fiscal year 1920 at $6,812,522,729 in his report submitted to the Republican Congress, but among these estimates were large provisions for matters which before the war had never been taken up by the Government, such as the Shipping Board, the wheat-guaranty fund, European food relief, the railroad control which cost the Government nearly a billion dollars, the War Finance Corporation, Housing Commission, and many other new undertakings.

The public anticipated a reduction in taxation following the close of the war. The taxes were, in fact, reduced, and very heavily reduced, but as no new law was passed reducing the taxes many people thought that they were not reduced, and others merely wondered how their income tax or excess-profits tax came to be much less than it was the year before.

When the "1918" law was passed in 1919, although it was not known what reduction could be made for the fiscal year 1920, fearing that a Republican Congress might get the credit for reducing taxes, the rates for the excess-profits taxes and income taxes for the calendar year of 1919 were reduced so much that it was not then believed enough revenue would be produced for the needs of the Government. On incomes above $4,000 the normal income tax was reduced from 12 per cent to 8 per cent. Below that amount, from 6 per cent to 4 per cent. The highest rates on excess profits had been 80 per cent. This was reduced to 40 per cent on incomes or profits in excess of 20 per cent, and 20 per cent on lower profits in excess of 10 per cent. This, according to the best estimates now obtainable, reduced the taxes which are now being paid on incomes and excess profits of last year the enormous sum of $1,450,000,000. Nevertheless assertions are frequently made that taxes have not been reduced, and many people are not aware that the reduction has been made.

The Republican Congress manfully set itself to the task of bringing expenditures down to the reduced revenues. The appropriation bills of the previous Congress had largely failed. The Republican Congress prepared new ones, reducing the appropriations nearly a billion dollars, and by its wise management has greatly reduced the deficit in the Treasury. Until the close of the fiscal year and the payment of the next installment of the income tax it can not be determined just how large that deficit will be.

Even with this explanation it may be that some will ask why taxes can not be further reduced for the next year. The answer is that at the end of this fiscal year we will still have a floating debt probably in excess of $2,500,000,000. This debt ought to be paid off. All short-time certificates of indebtedness ought to be taken up as soon as possible. This adds to the dangerous inflation of credits which now exists and which nearly all financiers agree renders our monetary system unstable and has greatly tended to increase the cost of living. Besides this the revenue from excess-profits taxes and incomes will be much less for the next fiscal year on account of the slowing down of business. It is probable that the loss of revenues from this source will be in the neighborhood of $800,000,000. If it had been possible to have a Republican tariff bill approved by the President it would be easy to largely increase the sum derived from customs duties and decrease the amount of taxes levied in other directions, but it was useless to prepare such a tariff bill when everyone knew it would be vetoed if passed. With reference to income and excess-profits taxes, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee on May 17 of this year, stated:

> It would be manifestly unsafe, in my opinion, to reduce now the income and excess-profits taxes to be collected in the calendar years 1920 and 1921.

He goes on further to say that he can see nothing in the financial prospects for the calendar year 1922 which would make impossible or unwise a modest reduction. My own opinion is that when once we have cleared up our floating debt and got rid of the enormous deficit which has been hanging over us that not merely a "modest reduction" but a very substantial reduction can and should be made in our Federal taxation. But for the present the Republican Congress must content itself with relieving the country from the enormous deficit in our Treasury which it inherited from Democratic management.

What I have heretofore stated with reference to the great increases in our regular appropriations not only shows how unfair but how foolish it is to make any claim that our governmental expenditures can or ought to be brought down to anything like the low amount that prevailed before the European war broke out. Indeed it was frequently stated on the Democratic side before the Republican Congress came in that there could be no reasonable expectation that our governmental expenditures for the next three or four years at least would be less than $4,000,000,000 per annum. Whether they are made less than that amount depends largely on our expenditures upon our Army and Navy, which for the ensuing fiscal year are estimated together at between $800,000,000 and $850,000,000. Unless these can be reduced, and I think they ought to be greatly reduced, we can not expect to bring our total expenditures for the following years to much less than $4,000,000,000.

If the President did not have a reputation for inconsistency that could not easily be made worse, his recent statement with reference to a reduction in taxation and change of form in taxation would certainly tend to lower it. He now says that taxes ought to be further reduced and their form ought to be changed, but in his message of December 2, 1919, to Congress he used the following language:

It is of the utmost importance that in dealing with this matter the present law should not be disturbed so far as regards taxes for the calendar year 1920 payable in the calendar year 1921.

The Republican Congress did not disturb them, and we are still getting our revenue under Democratic laws. They could not be repealed because by reason of the waste and lack of economy of the Democratic administration a great deficit had been created. It has not attempted to change the present form of taxation, because it would be idle to propose a comprehensive Republican revenue measure until a Republican Executive occupies the White House. If this change be made, as everyone believes it will be made, I am safe in saying that the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House will at once proceed to the formulation of a revenue bill which will not only reduce taxes for the calendar year 1921, payable in 1922, but collect them under a plan which will be more equitable and less oppressive to business than the present system.

The Federal Trade Commission and the Sugar Investigation in Utah.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MILTON H. WELLING,
OF UTAH,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, there is no more sensible rule of the House than that which restrains the membership from criticizing the motives of Members of the Senate. Any other course would lead to endless friction and unnecessary bitterness. I trust, therefore, that what is here said can not by any fair construction be construed to be a transgression of the rule.

It seems to me that the same degree of courtesy and fairness of statement should characterize the attitude of the House and Senate to the executive and judicial branches of the Government. I hope what I say will be fair in that regard also.

On Monday, May 24, a distinguished Senator delivered a speech in another body in which he charged that the Federal Trade Commission was using the power of the Government to defeat him for reelection to the Senate. He condemned this arm of the Government service, sworn to execute and uphold the law, in positive, bitter language. Strongly asserting his own innocence, he proceeded to denounce the commission as a rotten political agency bent upon his destruction. He said:

When any department of our Government undertakes to secure the defeat or the election of a United States Senator through an investigation of the affairs of a sugar company, it is time that such a contemptible practice be called to the attention of the public.

I am positive the honest people of this country will not approve of any such rotten politics. This very thing is taking place in the State of Utah, and to prove this statement I have but to recite what has in the past and is taking place to-day.

* * * * * * *

Shame upon officials of a department of the Government if they have lent themselves to such action. I think I know the people of Utah well enough to know that this sort of politics will never be countenanced, and if the officials of Washington are acting in this matter upon the advice of politicians of the State of Utah their action will not assist in any way in my defeat or their success.

He then proceeded to prove what I feel certain needed no proof at all, to wit, his own innocence. He quoted an imposing array of messages passed between himself and certain unnamed officials of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. regarding the authorized increase in western sugar from 10½ to 12 cents per pound. After each quotation he called upon some official of the Department of Justice to indorse the transaction and justify the policy adopted.

After having proven that he was innocent of misconduct, which no person had ever charged against him, he then proceeded to prove that the Federal Trade Commission was guilty.

He did that to his own satisfaction, but it did not satisfy me, and for that reason I have asked to place this statement of fact in the RECORD. The only evidence the Senator presented in condemnation and denunciation of the Federal Trade Commission is contained in two brief telegrams. And here, let me say, it is significant that the many messages between this distinguished Member of another body and the sugar officials did not carry date lines, names, or addresses; but when he presented his case against the Government the names of the despicable officials and "financial crooks" went with a bang into the RECORD, along with their duplicity and crime. Here are the messages:

RIGBY, 13, 1920.

GEORGE SANDERS,
Care of Dr. Snow, 60 First Avenue, Salt Lake City, Utah:

Expect to close; leaving here Saturday. What do you intend to do regarding Medford and Grants Pass proposed hearing? Wire me collect.

BEER, Federal Trade Commission.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, May 13, 1920.

HENRY W. BEER,
Special Counsel, Federal Trade Commission, Rigby, Idaho:

Do not know what to advise you about proposed hearing at Grants Pass. Think you ought to have about three weeks from now. One of your investigators should be there a week in advance lining up witnesses. Do not be in too big a hurry to finish your case, as public sentiment is fast changing and almost entirely for Government prosecution. Sugar magnates anxious for you to get through. Palmer should keep you on job. If you keep a going for two months, it will cost SMOOT his Senate seat. Better kill some time with Washington authority. Ogden to-morrow.

G. E. SANDERS.

9059, May 14, 1920.

Mr. Beer is counsel for the Federal Trade Commission in charge of this sugar investigation in the West. George E. Sanders is a private citizen in no way connected with the commission or any other branch of the Government service. He was merely a witness who had asked to be heard and who had a perfect right to be heard. The fact that he made an improper or a false statement in no way reflects upon the character of the Government officials or the propriety of the investigation they were charged under the law to make.

There is not another syllable or word presented aside from these telegrams that admits of criticism. After quoting them, the distinguished Senator closed his case and asks the people to bring in a verdict convicting everybody who opposes his reelection of "rotten politics" instigated by "financial crooks."

But before the verdict is rendered, I want to remark that about the only "rotten politics" thus far disclosed are found in the speech about which I now complain. They can not be charged to the Federal Trade Commission. The principal "crooks" involved in this transaction are still unidentified and roaming at large.

I do not complain because these telegrams finally reached the floor of another body and were read into the RECORD there. Men may differ in their ideas of what is important. But how did the Senator obtain possession of these messages? I charge here and now that they were stolen for him by some "financial crook" who is interested in the Senator's political fortunes. Either that is true, or they were furnished to the Senator by Mr. Beer or Mr. Sanders. Sanders is, no doubt, properly ashamed of his message. At any rate, I feel sure he did not send a copy to the Senator. The Beer message is as straight and fair as a sunbeam. The only bad thing about it at all is the contamination it received by touching the fingers of the individuals who stole it for contribution to this comedy of errors.

These messages were both taken from the private files of the Western Union Telegraph Co., at Rigby, Idaho, or Salt Lake City. As the record now stands, they were purloined by Mr. Joseph A. Jones, chief special agent of the Oregon Short Line Railroad. I know Mr. Jones personally. He is an estimable gentleman, and I am sure he will agree with me that this was a bad job of detective work. But Mr. Jones was only the hired man. The real culprit will be disclosed if the Senator will put his cards on the table and publish the letter transmitting the messages without cutting off the signature.

Perhaps the Senator did not know at the time of his speech that he was dealing in stolen goods. But he knows it now. What effort has he made to correct this sweeping accusation against the Federal Trade Commission? It is true that he inserted a letter from the chairman of the commission in an obscure part of the RECORD, but he knew that that would be done by others if not by himself.

How did the Federal Trade Commission treat the contemptible suggestion of Mr. Sanders? At once, before the day closed, "as soon as I could reach a telegraph office," says Mr. Beer, a proper rebuke was administered to Mr. Sanders, and he was peremptorily ordered to appear and complete his testimony, delayed to suit his own convenience or the convenience of the sugar company. Here is Mr. Beer's second telegram to Mr. Sanders:

RIGBY, IDAHO, May 14, 1920.

GEORGE E. SANDERS,
103 First Avenue, Salt Lake City, Utah:

Commission not interested in political situation. Must take up Grants Pass matters as soon as I reach there Wednesday or Thursday of next week. Your attendance will be imperative regarding books and other matters relating to that situation.

BEER,
Federal Trade Commission.

This message was in the same file at the time the other messages quoted above were taken. How accommodating it was of the "financial crook" to take out just the "rotten politics" and leave all the truth behind!

The people of Utah have bestowed upon our distinguished Senator almost every honor within their gift. They will continue to honor him long after his service here is ended. They know well the character of service he has given them. His untiring industry has won the admiration of men of every party and creed. His unquestioned devotion to the State has not in the past been doubted by any man. For every honor he has brought to them they have given equal honor in return. It is now asserted that he is indispensable to the State and to the Nation. Both State and Nation would have been better served without this intemperate and hasty attack.

Why does he start at shadows? Why does he go out in full armor to fight windmills? Why does he hold up his hands to the ghost and cry, "Thou canst not say I did it"? Why does he flee when no man pursueth?

His Senate speech of May 24 bears the fatal evidence of its own poison and panic. He undertakes to quote the words and construe the motives of a dead man, beloved by every man and woman in Utah. He says of the visit of Gen. Richard W. Young to Washington, in the early part of this year, "He was here to learn, if possible, if there was any truth in the rumor that the Federal Trade Commission was going to make an investigation of the affairs of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co.; and if so, upon what basis and for what reason." As a matter of fact, suit had been begun against Gen. Young's client four months before he came to Washington. The bill of complaint and Gen. Young's answer thereto were both in his pocket at the time of his visit here. If the Senator so woefully misunderstood Gen. Young in this matter, it does not require much imagination to convince me that he also misunderstood his reference to the political campaign at home.

Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to refer to this matter at all until the Utah papers, carrying press notices of the speech, reached Washington. Three hours after the speech was delivered these papers went to press with flaming headlines, crying to all the world:

Utah-Idaho sugar probe political move, is direct charge made by Senator SMOOT. Avers action was delayed in effort to defeat him for Senate. Reads telegrams in which Federal Trade Commission's attorney is told to hold up on work so as to "cost SMOOT Senate seat."

This headline is an accurate index to the mendacious and contemptible falsehoods which follow in the story below. As a matter of fact, the only delay in the prosecution of the case against the sugar companies was granted at the request of the sugar officials themselves. The record reveals the amazing fact that they asked for weeks of delay in addition to that granted by the commission, which additional delay the commission refused. How futile it seems in the light of these facts to charge that the delay was intended to injure the Senator politically. In fixing the date of this hearing I suspect the commission was equally influenced by the Senator's campaign for reelection and Dr. Cook's discovery of the North Pole.

The newspaper story proved that the Senator's speech had been carefully prepared for the press long before it was delivered and that the Senator's press service was running smoothly. In fact, the speech was read to at least two prominent Utah men some days before it reached the RECORD. The press story faked a Washington date line, to make it impressive and lend it authority. The same matter appeared in the Medford, Oreg., papers of that date. These papers continued to play up the story for days. Not one word reached their columns, so far as I have observed, containing the statement of the Federal Trade Commission which branded the whole newspaper propaganda as a lie from first to last. The poison had been sown and no hand was raised to stop its blighting touch.

I assert that it would be a wicked and an indefensible thing for the Federal Trade Commission to seek to influence the election of any man for public office. I submit that it is equally contemptible and indefensible for a public journal to wantonly and senselessly attack one of the agencies of public safety in the Government of the United States. This pitiful exhibition of partisan animosity could have been avoided entirely by a five-minute consultation over the telephone between the distinguished Senator and a representative of the commission. In place of that this whole business was nursed along for days, to spring in a sensational manner in the Senate after advance copies had been issued to the public press.

I am glad to know that the Federal Trade Commission is free from blame in this matter. Its officers have conducted themselves with dignity and with perfect respect to the rights of every man who comes to it with clean hands seeking justice. The only politics yet developed has been injected into the situation by nervous statesmen and local politicians, who go out and shoot at what they think is a bear and kill a farmer's cow.

The following letter from the chairman of the commission will justify every statement I have made and reassure every lover of good government and fair dealing in Utah. It will only disturb those who hoped to make political capital out of the crude and clumsy error of a private citizen:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, June 4, 1920.

Hon. MILTON H. WELLING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of June 2, in which you refer to a speech made by the Hon. REED SMOOT on the floor of the Senate on May 24 regarding the trial of the case of the Federal Trade Commission v. The Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. et al.

In your letter you say that you have my reply to Senator SMOOT of May 25, and you conclude with the request that I furnish you with a brief restatement of the essential facts in connection with this matter, including any additional developments since this correspondence was made public.

I address my remarks to that part of Senator SMOOT's speech in which he says:

"In the first place, I wish to go back some months when this unthinkable proposition was first brought to my attention by Gen. Richard W. Young during his visit to Washington as the attorney of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. He was here to learn, if possible, if there was any truth in the rumor that the Federal Trade Commission was going to make an investigation of the affairs of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co.; and if so, upon what basis and for what reason. Think of my surprise when he told me that he had no doubt the investigation would be made some time before the next election, and among other causes assigned was the one that it would help to defeat me for reelection."

To the foregoing statement I beg to say that the records of the commission show that all of the investigation in this case was completed previous to September 2, 1919, and complaint issued on that day. The registered receipts show that the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. received its complaint September 26; the American Sugar Co., September 23; A. P. Cooper, September 27; and E. R. Wooley, September 24. The Utah-Idaho Sugar Co., and all the other respondents filed their answers with the commission on October 27, 1919, so that by that time the case was at issue. Gen. Young visited the commission in company with Senator KING some time in the early part of 1920. He had in his possession at that time, when a conference was held with Mr. Porter, the chief counsel of the commission, and myself, the complaint and answer. There was no discussion about an investigation, for, of course, that had been completed a long time previous thereto. The conference was over the question as to how we would proceed with the trial and at what time. Mr. Porter and I urged that the testimony be taken at the earliest possible date. After a complete explanation on my part of our rules of practice and the method of procedure, Gen. Young seemed fully satisfied, and the conference, which had been most pleasant, broke up.

Our records show that we pressed for trial at the earliest possible date, and tried to have the case set for March 22, but that counsel for respondents, being busy with matters of legal importance, urged us to put it over till April 15. Mr. Beer, attorney for the Federal Trade Commission, was on the ground previous to March 22. The day was finally set for taking testimony only after our insistence on April 1. The records also show that the attorney for the commission insisted on hearings being held during the entire working hours on Saturdays, but counsel for respondents refused, and a compromise was finally reached whereby they worked half days on Saturdays.

The hearings commenced in Salt Lake City on April 1, and were held as follows: April 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, and May 3, 7, 8, 10, and 11. During the hearings the examination in chief of one George E. Sanders was taken at Salt Lake City. There seems to be a misunderstanding about Mr. Sanders's status. He is not, and never has been, an employee of the commission. He was solely a witness. His examination in chief was completed at Salt Lake City. During the cross-examination it appears in the record at page 3714 that Mr. Straup, attorney for one of the respondents, requested that part of the cross-examination of Mr. Sanders be held at Grants Pass, where there were some records which counsel for respondents desired to refer to. Mr. Beer had already notified counsel that he intended to examine other witnesses at Grants Pass, and consented to continue Mr. Sanders's cross-examination at that place. After the hearing at Salt Lake City, testimony was taken at Rigby, Idaho, and it was at that place that Mr. Beer sent the following telegram:

"RIGBY, May 13, 1220.

"GEORGE SANDERS,
"Care of Dr. Snow, 60 First Avenue,
"Salt Lake City, Utah:

"Expect to close; leaving here Saturday. What do you intend to do regarding Medford and Grants Pass proposed hearing? Wire collect.

"BEER,
"Federal Trade Commission."

He received the following reply from Mr. Sanders:

"SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, May 13, 1920.

"HENRY W. BEER,
"Special Counsel, Federal Trade Commission,
"Rigby, Idaho:

"Do not know what to advise you about proposed hearing at Grants Pass. Think you ought to have about three weeks from now. One of your investigators should be there a week in advance lining up witnesses. Do not be in too big hurry to finish your case, as public sentiment is fast changing and almost entirely for Government prosecution. Sugar magnates anxious for you to get through. Palmer should keep you on job. If you keep a going for two months, it will cost SMOOT his Senate seat. Better kill some time with Washington authority. Ogden to-morrow.

"G. E. SANDERS."

Immediately, and on the same day as the receipt of the telegram from Mr. Sanders, Mr. Beer wired him as follows:

"RIGBY, IDAHO, May 14, 1920.

"GEORGE E. SANDERS,
"103 First Avenue, Salt Lake City, Utah:

"Commission not interested in political situation. Must take up Grants Pass matters as soon as I reach there, Wednesday or Thursday of next week. Your attendance will be imperative regarding books and other matters relating to that situation."

I may say that the telegram was written while the hearing was being closed up at Rigby, and Mr. Beer sent Mr. Anderson, one of the examiners of the commission, to the telegraph office with it. Mr. Anderson is now in Washington and has identified this telegram of May 14 from Mr. Beer to Mr. Sanders as the one he sent on that date.

On May 24, and without having had any communication from Mr. Beer after the statement had been made by Senator SMOOT on the floor of the Senate, Mr. Porter, the chief counsel for the Federal Trade Commission, received a telegram from Mr. Beer, which telegram was contained in full in my statement to Senator SMOOT, and was incorporated by Senator SMOOT in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 26, 1920, page 7664. A part of the telegram from Mr. Beer contained a statement signed by Thomas J. Carney, the telegraph operator at Rigby, Idaho. I now have that statement in my possession. It reads as follows:

"May 13, 1920, I received a telegram from Henry Ward Beer, and while I was copying this message I noticed that Joe Jones, special agent for the Oregon Short Line, was standing behind me, I think, reading it as I copied it. May 16, 1920, Joe Jones called at the office to look over some papers regarding a rug missing in a shipment. As no one is here during the noon hour on Sunday, Mr. Jones asked me to leave the keys to the station with him. I was about to take the key to the office off the ring, when he told me to let him have all of them, as they wouldn't be so apt to get lost. I handed him all the keys. The agent, cashier, and myself went to dinner. I returned about 15 minutes after and found Mr. Jones looking over the Western Union messages. Soon as he saw me he put them back soon as possibly could. After he got over his nervousness he asked me if I had a copy of the message that was received for Mr. Beer May 14. I had a copy of the message that was received for Mr. Beer May 13. I told him I had a copy of every message received or sent, and told him that it was in the messages he was looking at when I came in. He then asked me to make a copy, and I refused to do so, as I didn't think he had a right to have same. After a little arguing, he said, 'All right; don't do it.' Signed, Thos. J. Carney."

In commenting on this telegram of May 24 to Mr. Porter, Mr. Beer said:

"Please note the dates. My telegram to Sanders was in the same bunch of messages with the Sanders telegram. Jones, who is not a Western Union employee, has deliberately concealed the facts as far as I am concerned. Trial is being conducted with absolute fairness to both sides, and not a breath of politics has been used directly or indirectly in connection with the hearings. Sanders but one of about 75 witnesses called so far for complainant. Senator SMOOT's name not mentioned in testimony or exhibits, except in list of stockholders of Utah-Idaho Sugar Co.

"HENRY WARD BEER,
"Special Counsel."

In conclusion, I beg leave to reiterate what I said in my letter to Senator SMOOT, that the commission has always rigorously refrained, and has so advised its employees, from taking any part in any matters of a political nature in its investigations and trials of cases.

Cordially, yours,

HUSTON THOMPSON,
Commissioner.

SPEECH

OF

HON. CLAUDE KITCHIN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, September 25, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, never since the birth of the Republican Party in 1856 has there been such a large division among the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee or the Republican Members of the House on a tariff bill as there is on the present dyestuff tariff bill. And never before in the history of the Republican Party was there as many as three members of the Ways and Means Committee who differed with the majority of their membership and filed a minority report against a protective tariff bill. There never was since the Republican Party was organized such a division of sentiment and thought and effort among the Republican membership of the Ways and Means Committee of the House as there exists to-day with respect to this bill. Almost every Republican member of that committee differs from every other member. There are hardly two Republicans on that committee that have the same thought right now with respect to this bill. In fact, I know one or two or three members each of whom not only differs with every other one but differs with himself. [Laughter.]

Now, take the distinguished chairman of the committee, for instance, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]; he not only differs with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] about some features of the bill, and with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] about some features, and with the gentleman from New York [Mr. MOTT], and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] about some features of it, but the distinguished chairman differs with himself on this important measure. [Laughter.] The gentleman first favored the license feature of this bill. He was committed to the license principle by the first tariff bill he introduced since he was made chairman. I refer to the potash bill. It contained a license provision, and the license feature was practically the only provision in it. That is the feature which the dye manufacturers desire in this bill. He then came to differ with himself and opposed the licensing feature of this bill. The dye-using manufacturers, such as the textile, leather, and wall-paper manufacturers, oppose the licensing feature.

Then in a few days, when the dye manufacturers again had their inning, the distinguished chairman began to differ with his last position, and then favored the license feature of the bill. Then in a few days afterwards, when the manufacturers of leather and textiles, and so forth, the dye-consuming manufacturers of the country had another inning, the gentleman opposed the licensing feature of the bill, and when we took a vote to report the bill out of the committee the gentleman from Michigan, contrary to his immediately previous opinion, was in favor of the license feature of the bill, and voted for it. When he made his speech here the other day he said he was going to vote against the licensing feature of the bill, and how he stands now on the proposition and how he is going to vote on it the Lord only knows, for the chairman himself does not know. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Generally, when a fellow has been on both sides of a question, and as often as the gentleman has on this, he has been right one time. [Laughter.] But in this particular and peculiar and unique case the gentleman from Michigan has been wrong both times [laughter], as I shall show before I get through. The dye manufacturers, the dye producers, on the one hand——

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now. The dye-producing manufacturers, on the one hand, and the dye-using manufacturers, on the other, can each console themselves with the fact that the distinguished chairman of this committee has been on their side at least twice on this question. [Laughter.] I remember when I was a boy my brother, about my size, and I had a punching bag which stood on a spiral cord about our height. It had the shape of a man's head and face. It was so arranged that the blow was always stricken on the back of the head, and when you struck it it would bound to the other side, turning its face toward you. I would strike it and it would bound to my brother with the face turned toward me, and my brother in turn would strike it back to me and it would turn around and look at him. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, these dye-producing manufacturers, on the one side, and these dye-using manufacturers, on the other, have for the last several weeks used our distinguished chairman's head as a punch bag between them. [Laughter.] The dye-producing manufacturers have struck him from one side and he would turn around and look at them, and the dye-using manufacturers have struck him from the other side and he has turned around and looked at them. [Laughter.] Apparently he has looked at them both ways at once for the last six weeks. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not like to see my distinguished chairman treated in that way, and out of my high regard for him and to relieve him of all further embarrassment I have offered him a proposition on which he can stand with his head erect and his eyes in front and keep still, without being punched backward and forward by the different interests, and I am going to put forward that proposition on a motion to recommit. [Laughter.]

We have all heard of the old saying that when thieves fall out honest men can get their dues. Well, gentlemen, when I see standpat tariff Republicans like LONGWORTH and FORDNEY and MOORE and MOTT and YOUNG, and other Republican members of the committee, fighting among themselves, as they are on this bill, I begin to hope that the people will possibly get a part of their dues. [Laughter.] But I am not as hopeful as many others are. I never agreed with Grover Cleveland on all things. But in many I was in hearty agreement. He was in his day the best judge of the nature and instincts and principles of political parties. Grover Cleveland said that the only thing that kept the Republican Party together was "the cohesive power of public plunder." [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Now it does look when we see this great division amongst standpatters like MOORE and LONGWORTH and FORDNEY and YOUNG and MOTT, and the other members of the Republican Ways and Means Committee, that Cleveland's statement and theory as to the Republican Party is going to be repudiated. But while "hope springs eternal in the human breast," it does not spring so in mine. [Laughter.] No, fellow Democrats; let us not think that this division is going to be kept up, because you must remember that "public plunder" by tariff is in front of them. [Laughter.]

The Republicans are like the fabled, jointed snake. When you struck it a hard blow it was said to be so jointed that it would break to pieces and go off into fragments in every direction, but that about sunset these fragments would begin to move toward each other from every quarter, and by nightfall they would all be back together, forming one live, whole snake again. [Laughter.] Well, sir, they have their divisions now. They seem like destructive divisions. It looks as if the Democrats now would have a chance to get in between and get something like justice and fairness in this tariff bill. But, gentlemen, just before the vote is taken you will see these fragments, like those of the jointed snake, coming from every quarter of this House and Capitol, getting together, and by the time the roll is called these Republicans will all be gathered together as one on the vote. [Laughter.]

I do not care what the 50 or more Republicans who declare they are opposed to the bill with the license feature in it say against it; I do not care how vehemently they vow they are going to vote against it. I do know how they are going to vote. They are going to vote for any kind of a bill that has in it a tariff to plunder the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when the vote comes we will renew our faith in Grover Cleveland's statement. His opinion of the Republican Party is going to be vindicated here to-day when we take this vote, because there is tariff plunder of the many for the benefit of the few in sight, and the cohesive power of that plunder will bring them together on the vote. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Do you know why they have fallen out among themselves now? It is because the tariff plunderers have fallen out among themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You see, the dye producers want this high, exorbitant tariff to enable them to get big prices and big profits out of the dye-using manufacturers. They want the high prohibitive tariff that they have in this bill in order to make the textile manufacturers, the leather manufacturers, the wall-paper manufacturers, and the paint manufacturers, and other dye-using manufacturers pay special tribute to them. These dye-using manufacturers heretofore, under Republican tariffs, have been among the chief tariff plunderers, but by this Republican bill they are made the victims of a special class of tariff plunderers, and, of course, they protest.

The dye manufacturers have some representatives on the floor of the House, and the dye-using manufacturers have their representatives on the floor of the House, and as the big tariff plunderers fall out, of course, their agents here have got to fall out. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

But, gentlemen, they will get together and evolve some plan of action before the final vote is taken, and then you will see practically all of them register "aye" when the vote is taken. I know that is going to be the case. They have fallen out here because there is a contest between the two classes of tariff barons, two classes of tariff robbers. But in all the history of the Republican Party there never was a division among them when the contest came between the tariff plunderers and the people of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democrats on the committee are going to offer, on a motion to recommit, a fair and just tariff bill, a protective tariff, if you please, on this one industry that stands in a class by itself, and do justice both to the dye manufacturers and the dye-using manufacturers, and justice to the consuming public. We are thus going to give the patriotic Republican Members of the House an opportunity to do the square thing.

It is conceded by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee that the dye and chemical industry is in a class all by itself. It is not only an absolute essential to the life of the Nation in time of war but is essential in time of peace for the maintenance of industries whose turnout is over $2,000,000,000 a year. The textile, the wall-paper, the leather, the paint, and many other industries could not exist unless they had a dye and chemical industry at home or abroad from which to obtain dyes and chemicals. The war found us without a dye industry. The manufacturer of textiles and other dye-using manufacturers were about to go under. They had to ransack the four quarters of the earth at any cost for dyes—wherever they could find a little dye here and a little there. The manufacturers that had any on hand had to divide it up among the other manufacturers. They had to take inferior dyes that were improvised here or elsewhere in order to bridge over until the time came when some necessary dyes could be manufactured here.

As I said, not only has the war proved that the maintenance of a dye and chemical industry here is essential to our manufacturers whose annual products amount to more than $2,000,000,000, but in time of war it is absolutely essential to the Government and the country.

Every country on earth is going to encourage the establishment of the dye and chemical industry because of its essential necessity in time of war or in time of peace. No nation hereafter can afford to be dependent for dyes and chemicals upon any foreign monopoly, as every nation was upon the German monopoly at the time the European war began. Least of all must this country be dependent for them upon any other country. Explosives, poisonous gases, and other chemicals will no doubt play the most important part in future wars. Whatever agreements there may be among nations, whatever covenants there may be with any league of nations, all nations will continue experimenting and developing these instruments of warfare. They can be produced nowhere except in the dye and chemical plants. Therefore it is absolutely necessary as a war essential that this industry be maintained in time of peace so that if war ever comes in spite of the League of Nations or international covenants we will be prepared not only to make the absolute essentials but in our chemical and dye plants we will have an experienced American crew ready to be turned over to the Government for its use and defense. The country which has the largest and most efficient dye and chemical industry will be the best prepared for war if war does come.

But, gentlemen, who discovered that they were essential and should be established and maintained? What party in this country first lifted its hand in encouragement of this war and peace essential industry? The Democratic Party. [Applause on Democratic side.] Ours was the first and only party that took steps for its establishment, encouragement, and maintenance here in these United States. In 1916 it was the Democratic Party, a Democratic House, a Democratic Senate, and a Democratic President that for the first time in the history of the Government put on the statute books a law that would encourage and protect and establish and maintain this great and important dye industry. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The Republican Party had been in power for more than 40 years. It had had control of the House, of the Senate, of the President. Let me show you what a pitiable condition 40 years of Republican rule left this industry in and what a helpless condition in the first emergency it placed the industries dependent upon dyes and chemicals. You do not have to take my word. I shall invoke, to confirm this statement, an authority no less and no more than the distinguished author of this bill, the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

I want you Republican gentlemen to pay particular attention to what I am about to read, and contemplate the shameless, the pitiable, the helpless condition that 40 years of Republican control left this war and peace essential industry in, and other dependent industries with their billions of capital. Contemplate, too, the distressed situation it placed the Government itself in. I hold in my hands the splendid report of Mr. LONGWORTH, the author of this bill, prepared and filed on behalf of the majority of the committee. Let me read you from page 3 of this report:

> The economic importance of the industrial side of this question is illustrated by the fact that industries in this country producing nearly $3,000,000,000 worth of goods each year are absolutely dependent upon coal-tar dyes, and industries producing as much more annually are indirectly dependent upon coal-tar dyes and kindred materials.

Now, listen carefully:

> For many years before the war we had practically no dye industry in this country.

Why? Answer: After 40 years of Republican control. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Read on:

> Such dye works as we had were merely assembling plants for German material.

Why? Forty years' absolute control by the Republican Party.

> Accordingly, all the huge industries requiring dyestuffs were absolutely at the mercy of Germany.

Why? Forty years of Republican control. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What a neglect of the vital interests of this country by the Republican Party! And what a confession! Let us read further:

> And they (our huge American industries) could have been dealt a crushing blow by Germany at any time the German trust saw fit.

Why? Forty years of absolute, undisturbed control of the tariff and other legislative policies by the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What an indictment—what a condemnation of the Republican Party by one of its most distinguished members. Let us read on. He said that after the European war began—> if she (Germany) had had the power to send her own textiles into this country, she would have inflicted a blow upon our textile industry from which probably it would never have recovered.

Why? The only answer—40 years of Republican control!

Germany had not the shipping, Mr. LONGWORTH says. If her shipping had not been interrupted, if the British Navy had not barred her from free access to the seas and she had had the power to send her own textiles into this country, she would have inflicted a blow upon our entire textile industry, with its output of more than $2,000,000,000 a year, from which probably it would never have recovered, says Mr. LONGWORTH. Think of it!

In 1916 the dye and chemical industries of this country, few and small though they were, and persons interested in the expansion and development of a real dye industry in this country, came to a Democratic Congress for encouragement. They knew that they could not depend upon Republicans in or out of Congress to do the right and proper thing. They knew that they had been coming to Republican Congresses for 25 years or more begging for some protection and encouragement and getting none. They came here during the consideration of the McKinley bill in 1890; they came here during the consideration of the Dingley bill in 1897; they came here during the consideration of the Payne bill in 1909, and asked the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee and the Republican Congress to do something for them. For 25 years they had been warning Republican Congresses that this was a war as well as a peace essential industry; that if war ever came and shut us off from the foreign dyestuffs our whole textile and other dye-consuming industries might fall. But a deaf ear on every occasion was turned to them by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee and the Republican membership of Congress. Why? They were writing tariff bills for the big industries, for the big fellows and not for the little ones. The little dye industry had only a few million dollars invested and they were few in number, while the textile industry, the cotton industry, the woolen industry, the silk industry, the leather industry, the paint industry, and the wall-paper industry and others using dyes amounted to billions of dollars and turned out billions of dollars worth of products. They were the big fellows. They opposed an adequate duty on dyestuffs, because they wanted to go to Germany and elsewhere and obtain their dyes in the cheapest markets. They preferred the German monopoly to the establishment of an essential home industry. The Republicans in Congress always agreed with them. They opposed the payment of tariff duties on what they bought. They favored tariff, high protective tariff duties, only on what they sold. They demanded that the Republicans in Congress put no or as low a tariff as possible on the materials they purchased—on chemicals and dyestuffs. The Republicans obeyed. This obedience caused the pitiable, helpless condition and situation described by Mr. LONGWORTH in his report.

The dyestuff fellows had not then grown big enough to walk up to the Republicans in Congress, as they do now, and demand of them what they must do. Men like the Du Ponts had not gone into the business then. They had not gone into it in 1916 when representatives of the industry came to a Democratic Congress. They are in it now. They have made their demands and into this bill their demands went—in normal time a prohibitive, monopolistic tariff.

Let me call attention to the fact that when the Payne bill was considered, which turned down the appeals of the little dyestuff fellows, Mr. FORDNEY, the present chairman, and Mr. LONGWORTH, the author of this bill, were members of the Ways and Means Committee. Before that very committee the dye manufacturers, the little fellows, appeared and said, "Gentlemen, if you will just give us 40 per cent ad valorem we will establish a dye and chemical industry here that will compete with Germany and the world." That was all they asked, 40 per cent, while this bill will amount in normal times to over 100 per cent. But at that time the big fellows—the textile and other dye-using manufacturers—standing in the back of the room in the rear of the little dyestuff fellows, shook their heads. Mr. FORDNEY was on the committee. Mr. LONGWORTH was on the committee. They heard the little fellows' appeal and saw the big fellows' shake of the head. Was Mr. MOORE a member of the committee then?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; we did not have the benefit of his distinguished services at that time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Do you know what Mr. LONGWORTH and Mr. FORDNEY did? They walked right straight out of that committee into the House with a bill and a report in their hands giving the textile and all other dye-consuming industries everything they asked—they demanded—and refusing to give to the little, struggling dye industry anything it asked.

In 1916 the representatives of the dye industry and many patriotic persons interested in the building up and maintaining a real dye industry in this country came and put their case before a Democratic Congress. They knew that the fundamental principles of the Democratic Party were equal rights to all and special privileges to none. Republicans though they were, they decided to try us and see what we meant by "equal rights to all." They had found out by 25 years of experience and efforts that the Republicans neither practiced nor preached such a doctrine.

We were in full control. I was the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. They came down and we gave them a full hearing. They saw your humble servant sitting up there as chairman, with Democrats on his right—13 of them—and we did not look to them as bad and vicious and destructive as the Republican stump speakers and the tariff barons' press had described us. After looking us over they took faith. They asked for a great deal more than they needed; in fact they told us so. The Republicans on the committee, though, when at all times for 40 years they and their party had the power to do so, had refused to them any protection, any encouragement, then without power or responsibility wanted to "out-Herod Herod" in giving them tariff protection. They told the dye-industry gentlemen that what "Mr. KITCHIN and the Democrats offered or would offer would be a fake and a farce; it would be absolutely impotent to establish or maintain any industry"; that what they needed was the so-called Hill bill, a high, exorbitant, prohibitive tariff. But we Democrats kept a cool head. We were willing to do what was right and proper. We recognized that this industry was a war as well as a peace essential; that it stood in a class all to itself; that we should establish and maintain here in the United States a real dye and chemical industry, so that our Government and its vast industries should not be solely dependent upon foreign plants in times of emergency or of war. The dye men came down in behalf of the Hill bill, to which my friend Mr. LONGWORTH will refer in his next speech, with its excessive prohibition rates. Their star witness was Mr. Schoelkopf, one of the big figures in the dye industry now, and then the biggest dye manufacturer in the United States, making more than 50 per cent of all of the dyes that we made here. I knew what he had testified to in the hearings on the Payne bill and also before the Underwood Ways and Means Committee. He told the Payne committee that 40 per cent would protect and establish the industry here, and with that it could stand up against the competition of the world, and four years later he told the Underwood committee that if we would give them 35 per cent ad valorem they could establish the industry here and meet all competition. So after the hearings were over and Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. LONGWORTH and all of the Republican members were jumping around trying to out-tariff themselves for the dye industry, and thus atone for the wrongs they and their party had done to it for 25 years or more, I told the dye people the sentiment among the Democratic members with respect to the encouragement and establishment and maintenance of a dye and chemical industry here.

I said to them, "You go back home and get together the representatives of the dye-producing industry and the representatives of the dye-using industries, tell them what the Democratic sentiment is here about this matter, and then have them appoint a committee of three to represent all the industries—the dye-making and dye-using industries—and if you want to talk sense and right and justice then come down here and we will talk with them."

In about a week or 10 days they wired me that they had met in New York and had appointed a committee to confer with us. I wired them to come down. They came. I called in Judge HULL, of Tennessee, and Mr. McGillicuddy, of Maine, two members of the committee, and in my office we conferred from 7 o'clock in the evening until past 12 o'clock. We went over the whole situation. They represented the dye-consuming and the dye-producing industries. All finally agreed that the Hill bill was not the proper bill; that the rates were too high, higher than the industry really needed to establish and maintain itself against competition. I recall well that their spokesman said: "Mr. KITCHIN, the industry does not need the rates and provisions of the Hill bill, and while naturally we wanted all we could get, yet to build up and maintain the industry we must admit that a bill with provisions as suggested by you and your colleagues is all that is necessary. Give us that, and in five years we will have an industry here that will successfully compete with Germany and the world." Our committee reported such a bill. It was enacted into law. It is now on the statute books. It worked well and satisfactorily. The dye-producers and the dye-using industries approved it. I do not have to commend our work in this matter, but I want to tell you that it does gratify me when a standpatter like J. HAMPTON MOORE comes in and applauds an act which we Democrats prepared and passed over his protest, over his vote. It is enough to make a fellow like me feel good. How did this Democratic act work in the face of the denunciations and prophecies at the time of its passage, of Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. MOORE and Mr. LONGWORTH and other Republicans that it would do no good, that it was absolutely impotent, that under it we could not establish any industry here, that it was a fake, that "Mr. KITCHIN had fooled the dye manufacturers," and so forth? I am going to let my good friend, Mr. MOORE, tell you. I am going to read it from his report on this bill filed a few days ago. I tell you when Republicans begin to fight each other the truth will come out sometime. When men like my partisan friend, J. HAMPTON MOORE, fight Democrats and Democrats only, it is the "doggondest" hardest thing to get them down to the truth, but I watched this fight among Republicans and I said, "Now, the truth may come out from one side or the other." [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH has showed us the truth about the industry under 40 years of Republican rule. Now, I am going to show how matters were changed when the Democrats did something for them that the Republicans had neglected for 40 years. I am going to give you the testimony of the man who voted against this Democratic measure because, as he claimed, it was a fake and a failure. Let me read you from Mr. MOORE'S minority report. The gentleman from Illinois need not ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he wrote this report, for he did, as I see the gentleman from Pennsylvania bows his head. He says that this Democratic act has worked wonderfully successful. He says that dye industries were being built up throughout this country under this Democratic law that he voted against. Turn to page 4 of the gentleman's report and we will read:

The protective tariff provided in the existing dyestuff law—

That was the law we passed over the gentleman's protest——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I answer? I have the record——

Mr. KITCHIN. No. This is the gentleman's last record; this is his report.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I have a minute of the gentleman's time to read this. I have Dr. Herty's testimony here.

Mr. KITCHIN. This is better than Dr. Herty; this is what the gentleman says in his report.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The hearing is here.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have the hearings, too. I have the gentleman's last word on the subject in his report of a week ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me finish reading this.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Surely; I will read it in my time.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can read it in his own time. I am going to read that little language just one more time. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] On page 4 of his minority report Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE says:

The protective tariff provided in the existing dyestuff law—

Our Democratic law—was admitted to be sufficient prior to our entering the war in Europe.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

This stand-pat Republican says this Democratic law, the only law that was ever put on the statute books by any party to encourage and maintain this great war essential and peace essential, was sufficient to build up and maintain the industry. We have here the high priest of stand-pat Republicanism declaring solemnly in his report to be filed and kept in the archives of our Government that this Democratic law was all sufficient. Do not you know I am a little suspicious about having such an indorsement as that? [Laughter on the Republican side.] Now, I am going to be candid.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentleman will please take his seat. [Laughter.] I refuse to yield at this moment. That was my opinion of the law when I first framed it. It was my opinion of its operation, and my prediction on the floor of this House when I presented it to the House and urged its passage. Its operation confirmed my opinion and verified my prediction. But I do want to know if the gentleman is willing here in this presence to confess that truth and will ask him: "Will you not put your hand on your heart and say that you told the gospel truth when you put that splendid commendation of that Democratic tariff law in that report?"

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Dr. Herty, of North Carolina——

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh now, gentlemen; I appeal to the court to make the witness, if he proposes to answer, answer it yes or no. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am willing to take the statement of Dr. Herty. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has got Dr. Herty on his mind, and I have got "Dr. Moore" on my mind. [Laughter.] You shall not get the mind of this House on as poor a subject as Dr. Herty when it has its mind on as good a subject as you. [Laughter.] I appeal to the manhood of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania and ask him to answer "yes" or "no." Will the gentleman please be courteous enough to answer "yes" or "no"?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman appeal to my manhood for an answer to that question?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I will take that back. If I did, I would not get any answer. [Laughter.] I appeal to your mercy to answer it yes or no. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can answer yes or no; I can answer categorically.

Mr. KITCHIN. Answer it yes or no.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So far as the——

Mr. KITCHIN. Do it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a good act, but Dr. Herty, a good North Carolina Democrat——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has got Dr. Herty on the brain. Dr. Herty is in Germany now, and we will let him stay there until you answer the question. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He is from the gentleman's own State. He is a Democrat.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, out of all respect to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, I have not time to fool with him unless he is going to give me a real manly answer, yes or no. Is this the gentleman's report?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right. [Laughter.]

I wish to say here, inasmuch as the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania is going to voluntarily retire from the House, that in the recent mayoralty contest in Philadelphia he won one of the greatest victories ever achieved in a municipal election in this country, and I say it sincerely. [Applause.] I will tell you what I think of J. HAMPTON MOORE. There is no man in the House of whom I am more fond. I thought so much of him and wanted him to win the nomination for mayor so much that I wore a "J. Hampton Moore" button around with me. The Lord knows that before I die I want to see one good, able, honest, manly fellow mayor of the city of Philadelphia, and he is going to make that kind of mayor. [Applause.] Philadelphia may have had other such mayors, but I did not know them. I know J. HAMPTON MOORE, and I know that Philadelphia is going to have in him as good a mayor as any city in this country has ever had. [Applause.] Now, he is going out of Congress, and has no ax to grind or votes to get any more in his district, and with his nomination behind him—which means his election—it seems to me he ought to answer that question yes or no. [Laughter.]

Well, gentleman, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania put that commendation of the Democratic act in his report. I want to call another protective-tariff witness as to the virtue of this law. In the gentleman's minority report—and I have not time to read it—if you will turn to page 7, you will find another protectionist, a dye manufacturer, who commends this Democratic act.

You will find in his report that the National Aniline & Chemical Co., which, excepting the Du Ponts, is the biggest dye manufacturing company in the United States, commends this Democratic act. It asks for no change of rates from existing law.

Now, gentlemen, I wish to discuss the license feature of the bill. The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee in 1916 and the Democratic Members of the House and the Senate, and the President, all cooperating together, felt that this was one of the industries that was in a class by itself, as I have explained. We felt it was the duty of Congress never again to permit the great industries of this country to confront the situation that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] described in his report.

It is our duty as Americans to so frame laws as to encourage and establish and maintain this big key war and peace essential industry. In ordinary times, in normal times, the act of 1916 would be all sufficient. But, gentlemen, we believe, both Democrats and Republicans, that this industry ought under all circumstances to be maintained. It is absolutely necessary. The Republicans believe that there should be a great deal higher tariff than is necessary. They believe in a prohibitive tariff. They want to give the dye manufacturers what the dye manufacturers want. The Democrats are willing to give what the industry needs. We do not want to establish and maintain an absolute monopoly here, nor do we want a tariff so low that Germany or any other country can drive us out and establish their monopoly here. We want real competitive conditions. The tariff that the Democrats passed in 1916 will meet conditions in normal times. I agree with Mr. LONGWORTH exactly in the view that for the next two years no tariff will protect or maintain the industry here; you can make this tariff as high as the Longworth bill, which will be prohibitive in normal times, and you can make it twice as high, and that will not prevent Germany and it will not prevent Great Britain and France in the next two years from dumping upon us their millions and millions of dollars' worth of dyes which they have accumulated during the war for purposes of war materials. A dye, with just one little inexpensive turn, can be converted into an explosive or a poisonous gas or other munition of war.

Germany had on hand when this war closed, if my information is correct—and it seems that the departments and all the commissions that investigated the question think so—enough dyes and chemicals to supply the world for a year or two. Great Britain had a large surplus; so did France. What kind of a tariff could keep Germany and Great Britain from dumping this surplus on this market? Germany made the bulk of dyes used, not only in this country but throughout the world, for 25 years before the war. America was her greatest market. She sold 85 per cent of the dyestuffs that this country used. We produced here only about 15 per cent of our consumption. Germany is most anxious to again get this market. To do it she must destroy, if possible, the industry here. She could afford to sell here below cost. She would do it. She could afford to give away her products here in order to destroy our industry so that again she could monopolize the American market. Germany and Great Britain and France all would be interested in breaking down the American industry by one means or another, so that America, the biggest, richest market in the world, would be open to them. With their huge surplus on hand, no tariff, however high, could prevent them. But with the industry absolutely maintained and protected here for two years, the transition period from abnormal to normal by means of the license system, the foreign surplus will have been disposed of, conditions will become normal, and, in my opinion, existing rates will prove amply sufficient. If they should not, Congress would then be in a position to intelligently consider the proper rates. With a proper license provision for two years enacted we will know that the American industry will be protected against unfair competition, against the dumping of the foreign surplus below cost, and maintained with fair and reasonable competition. Germany and Great Britain could not hope to destroy the industry here. They would not try it. They could not effect anything.

I agree, therefore, with Mr. LONGWORTH in his report when he says that even the highest tariff rate in his bill will do absolutely no good toward maintaining the industry here for the next two years, and that the only way to protect and maintain the industry is by a license provision. But I am not for the particular kind of license board which he favors and which is contained in this bill.

I am opposed, as a permanent policy, to the license system. It is vicious in principle. It is undemocratic. It is unrepublican. It is un-American. But we do many things in an emergency that in ordinary times are undemocratic and unrepublican and un-American. We passed last year many acts, to bridge over temporary emergencies, that we would all vigorously oppose as permanent propositions. Now, in my judgment, if you, gentlemen, Republicans and Democrats, think it is necessary or that it is proper or that it is our duty to maintain this great peace and war essential industry which has been built up since the war began, and built up partly before we got into the war under the Democratic measure of 1916, there can be no question but that the only way that has been pointed out for us to absolutely maintain it for the next two years is by a temporary license provision.

That provision in the bill does not mean that one can not import. It simply means that he must get license to import articles in the chemical and dyestuffs schedule if he can not get them here at a reasonable price and on reasonable terms. The license board, or commission, must grant the license, if one shows that he can not get them here at a reasonable price or on reasonable terms and prompt delivery. We want to bridge over this abnormal period of two years, this extraordinary dumping period, you might say. We only provide for two years of license. Then American industries can stand on their own bottoms, protected only by the beneficent and sufficient Democratic tariff law that is now on the statute books. We Democrats take the position that this is no time to tinker with tariff rates. No one knows anything about the cost of production abroad in these abnormal times. No one has told us the cost at this time of production at home. Not a manufacturer of dyes has dared to tell us the cost of his production of a single dye or chemical he makes. How, then, with lack of such data, can we intelligently consider tariff rates at this time? Who can tell the just or proper rates? The only thing we do know is that the rates in the bill are the rates the dye producers of this country want. We do know that in normal times they are excessive and prohibitive. When the first popgun tariff bill was pending—the chemical, glass, and surgical-instrument, tariff bill—I stated the Democratic position as follows:

> Nobody knows at this time how to write intelligently or scientifically a tariff bill on the Republican theory or on the Democratic theory, because we have got to know, in considering and writing a tariff according to the Republican theory, what the difference is between the cost of production abroad and here; and in considering a tariff according to the Democratic theory we ought to have a reasonable knowledge as to the difference in the cost. It is admitted by everybody that this is not known at this time, and can not be known what it will be a week or a month or a year hence, because of the rapidly varying conditions. Here is the Democratic position: We realize the wisdom and necessity of maintaining the chemical and dyestuff industry and a few other industries essential in the production of materials for direct munitions of war, which industries were established here during and by the necessities of the war, but which are valuable in the production of necessary articles of everyday use. In the present and ever-changing conditions, having no data or facts upon which to intelligently base a tariff rate, the Democrats propose for a period of two years—a reasonable transition period from abnormal to normal conditions—a license system for importation of chemicals and dyestuffs and the few war essential materials referred to by me a moment ago; that the Tariff Board shall constitute the license board; that no license to import such articles shall be granted within the two years—the transition period from abnormal to normal—unless it be shown that they can not be obtained in the United States at a reasonable price; if such be shown, license to import shall be granted. This will with certainty protect these newly established war essential industries and at the same time prevent the manufacturers here from demanding exorbitant prices. By the expiration of the two years we can hope that conditions of production and values here and elsewhere throughout the world will become normal. By then the Tariff Commission and others can give Congress proper data as to the cost of production at home and abroad. We can then, if it ever could be done, ascertain the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. Both the Republicans and Democrats will then be in an intelligent position to write a tariff and fix rates according to their respective theories. Why is not this the intelligent, reasonable, and patriotic position for all of us to take? We know and you know that any rate we can fix under existing conditions is a pure guess, unless we do as the Republicans propose to do by this and other bills, and that is give the rate the manufacturers desire and demand. As a permanent proposition we do not favor the import license system. We propose it as a temporary measure to bridge over the extraordinarily abnormal conditions throughout the world.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have heard my friend say here before that the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. FORDNEY] is, as he regards him, an extreme protectionist. I should like to ask the gentleman what is his view of the opinion expressed by the chairman of the committee in his speech day before yesterday, when, in discussing the licensing system, he said this:

> The point I want to make is—though I will bow to the will of the majority of this House—that we ought to strike from this bill the licensing feature and adopt a bill with the rate of duties provided for in the bill as now framed and then enact an antidumping clause to protect fully and adequately all institutions engaged in the manufacture of dyestuffs as well as all others.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman may have changed, and doubtless has changed, his opinion on that two or three times since he made that statement. [Laughter.] I have heard the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] say in the committee several times that he had never known of a sufficient antidumping provision. He thought he was against the license feature when he made that speech, because he fears that with it the tariff rates will not be as high as without it. He wants at all times and under all circumstances a sky-high tariff wall.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; just for a moment.

Mr. LAYTON. With the licensing commission composed as it is under the bill——

Mr. KITCHIN. I am coming to that.

Mr. LAYTON. I have been trying to get at this two or three times.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to give the gentleman a chance to get right square at it now.

Mr. LAYTON. I want to know just this one thing: With the licensing commission composed as it will be under this bill of the woolen and worsted manufacturing associations, the cotton manufacturing associations, the pulp and paper associations, the pharmaceutical associations, and covering the whole broad realm of industrialism, what guaranty is there that a board composed in that manner, having it in their power to grant these licenses, will not open a floodgate of foreign importations of the articles each member of the board wants for his industry rather than protect this dyestuff industry, and at the same time prevent their competitors from importing?

Mr. KITCHIN. According to their interests. The gentleman hits the nail on the head. They can do that under this provision which I oppose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just let me reply first to the gentleman from Delaware. The gentleman hits the nail on the head to a certain extent. They could do that if they could get a majority of that commission in favor of that policy. On the other hand, there are dye manufacturers on this board, too, and if they could get a majority of that commission with them they would not allow any dyes to come in, although the textile manufacturers might need dyes that they could not get here except at an exorbitant, hold-up price.

Now, let us see how that works. I am with you. I am against the licensing board provided for in this bill. I am for the tariff board; as to the license board, I will say in justice to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that while he is committed to the principle of licensing, he is not committed to this particular licensing board in the bill. And that is true of other gentlemen. Though they might have voted to report out this bill, they were not committed to this particular licensing system, but after conference the Republicans on the committee thought this was the best way to get it out of the committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just for a minute.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman spoke a minute ago about the antidumping provision, and stated that in his opinion it would not avail in this particular situation.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think it will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I entirely agree with the gentleman on that proposition. Let me suggest to him two reasons: First, that it will be utterly impossible to keep a record of the prices for which 11,000 different colors are selling in Germany, because that would be involved in any antidumping provision. Second, that inasmuch as commercial transactions in Germany now are carried on with the mark, and the mark is at a discount in this country of something like 75 per cent, it would be utterly impossible to keep such a record as that.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman may be correct about that. I have not investigated the mark proposition or considered its decreased value in relation to imports.

I oppose this licensing provision in the bill because it is not a right, a fair, a just, nor does it provide for a constitutional method of making appointments of its members. I do not believe that any power, association, or corporation, or any outside of the Government itself should appoint officers of the Government, and even if Congress had the power to give the appointment of Federal officers to outside private interests, as this bill proposes to do, this method in the bill would be manifestly impracticable and unfair.

It provides that there shall be so many members of this dye-licensing commission; they must be appointed, some by the Cotton Manufacturers' Association, some by the Woolen Manufacturers' Association, some by the Druggists' Association, some by the Dye Manufacturers' Association, and so forth, all private corporations, all private corporate interests. Now, it would possibly—yea, probably—work as the gentleman from Delaware suggested, in this way: For instance, say, I am a cotton manufacturer and the gentleman from Delaware is a cotton manufacturer. We are competitors. We have large business; we are selling in the same territory; we sell the same class of goods, but he happens to be a member of this board. I am not. Now, I would have to go to him, or to this board of which he was a member, and tell them my whole business, how much dye I needed, what I was going to dye, what colors I wanted and the kind, and so forth. He would be without business instinct, he would be above ordinary men, if he would let me, his competitor, have those dyes that I wanted in order to compete with him. The minute I applied to the board he would at once know the condition of my business, what I was in need of, what colors I was going to put out, what kind of dye I was going to use on my hosiery and underwear, cotton cloth, and so forth. He would be keen and shrewd enough not to vote on it himself, but he would go to the men appointed by the drug association and other associations and say, "Here, I know about this fellow's business; he does not need those dyes at all; he is putting up a bluff," and so when it came to the board the gentleman would be tactful enough not to vote, but his associates would know all about it and they would vote not to let me have those dyes. The drug man would know that a manufacturer and producer of drugs, one of his competitors, was coming before the commission sooner or later for chemicals needed by him in production of drugs. He could count on the gentleman from Delaware whom he has favored to stand by him and not let his competitors have a license to import. That is the way it will or may work.

Mr. LAYTON. I wish the gentleman would not put me on that board. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. He is not going to be appointed; he would do the fair, right thing; he would be disqualified. [Laughter.]

This license provision in the bill is absolutely null and void. If the author and other members of the Ways and Means Committee who voted for it had thought about it they would have known that the whole scheme was null and void. Never in the history of the Government has a proposition been submitted to the House or Congress permitting private interests, private corporations, to select Government officials to perform a high and important governmental function, except in this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Congress can not delegate to private corporations such powers in that respect.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is absolutely correct. If the majority members of the committee had thought for one moment, they would have known it. Any schoolboy would know that they had no right to allow private interests to appoint officials of the Government of the United States to perform the functions of that Government.

If the distinguished gentleman, the author of the bill, and others who reported it out had turned to the Constitution of the United States, Article II, they would have found that there are only four ways by which any officer of the United States Government can be appointed. All officers, according to the Constitution, must be appointed in one of four ways. First, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; second, but "Congress by law may vest," the appointment of such inferior officers, "in the President alone" without confirmation of the Senate; third, "in the courts of law"; and, fourth, "in the heads of departments."

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and other majority Members want to abrogate the Constitution and say that members of the license board shall be appointed by the National Cotton Manufacturers' Association, the National Woolen Manufacturers' Association, the leather association, the dye association, and so forth. [Laughter.]

You know that the dye manufacturers want this bill, and they want the licensing commission just like it is in here, and some of the dye-using manufacturers—not all of them—want it because they are going to sit on the board and they would get their stuff in and keep their competitors' stuff out. They would let the dye producer hold up all but themselves.

Every man in this House knows that every man that is elected a Member of this House before he can vote, before he can act at all, must stand before the Speaker in the presence of the other Members, in the presence of the officers of the House, and swear to support the Constitution with this Article II, section 2, in it.

Some of us Democrats think that this is a sacred document and that sometimes, at least, we ought to recall that oath. But what chance does the Constitution stand in a Republican House or committee when a demand is made by the Cotton Manufacturers' Association, the Woolen Manufacturers' Association, and other associations to defy it? [Laughter.] They have been taught by the protective-tariff barons and manufacturers throughout the United States for the last 50 or 60 years that their first allegiance is to the petitions and demands of these associations. [Laughter.] They are not going to let the Constitution stand in the way of complying with their demands. Of course, the Constitution went out of the window and the demands of these protective-tariff barons went into the bill. [Laughter.]

I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from Ohio if he does not think there is a little doubt after reading these plain, clear provisions of the Constitution with respect to the method of these appointments provided for in the bill? [Laughter.]

Had we not better do the proper thing, we Members who believe with Mr. LONGWORTH that a temporary license is proper at this time, and have the license board constitutionally created and its members constitutionally appointed? If we are going to have this license feature, the right thing to do is to put it in the hands of a Government agency, and we Democrats propose, and some Republicans, I think, will agree with us—I would not be surprised if Mr. LONGWORTH himself were not favorable to it—that the licensing system should be put in charge of the United States Tariff Commission. Give it the power to grant these licenses upon the terms set out in the bill. The commission has been properly created and its members constitutionally appointed. It has been studying the chemical and dyestuff proposition for nearly two years. They are disinterested; they are not representative of this industry or of that industry, and they are going to look at the evidence before them in a judicial way. I doubt if the domestic producers can fool them either, because they have been studying the cost of production at home and as much as they can abroad in this dye industry for the last two or three years, and before we actually got into the war they had sent men to Germany and elsewhere to study the cost of production abroad. They know something about it. They already have the facilities and the powers to find out the cost of production here and abroad. They should know what a reasonable price is. They, under the powers granted them, can send for the books of these dye manufacturers and can ascertain, if possible, what it costs to produce dyes or chemicals here. This license commission proposed in this bill has no such powers. Let us try to have a fair, disinterested license commission—the Tariff Board—and then in my judgment we will be on the way to maintain this big war and peace essential industry without extortionate prices to the people, to the dye-using industries, and without discrimination in favor of one industry against another.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BRYNES of South Carolina. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] on Tuesday referred to the manner in which the Chemical Foundation Co. was organized.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to come to that in a moment, but before that let me say, I shall offer a motion to recommit, to make the Tariff Board the license board, and also taking the Tariff Board's copy of the bill, which it presented to our committee, and on which it worked for a year and a half, and its suggestion as to amendments, so that the bill will operate just as the Congress intended for the present act to operate.

In this motion to recommit we have changed the rates of existing law in one particular. We have increased the ad valorem rates on group 2, the intermediates, from 15 per cent ad valorem plus 2½ cents per pound specific to 25 per cent ad valorem plus 2½ cents per pound specific, because all of the testimony before the committee shows that the ad valorem rate on the intermediates, group 2, should be substantially the same as on group 3. On group 3, the finished dyes, the duty is 30 per cent plus 5 per cent. This remains as in existing law. We have made the rate on the intermediates 25 per cent ad valorem, but that does not mean more cost to the user of the finished dyes. We add no further rate on such finished dyes. I believe that every Democrat in this House can afford to vote for it. In fact, I do not think that any Democrat can afford to vote against such a motion to recommit, and I would say that all patriotic Republicans ought also to vote for it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman did not mean to convey the impression that the Tariff Board had recommended any changes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not in rates; no. But it does think—rather its experts think—that there should not be so great a difference in the ad valorem rates on groups 2 and 3 as there is in existing law; that the rates should be substantially the same.

Mr. LONGWORTH. From what the gentleman said that would be the inference.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have in the proposed motion to recommit changed the rate of the existing law to comport exactly with the views of experts on that. We all—Republicans and Democrats—agree that the ad valorem rates on group 2 and group 3 should be substantially the same. We increase, therefore, the rate in group 2 from 15 per cent to 25 per cent ad valorem in our proposed motion to recommit.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. What is the gentleman's idea as to the effect of the establishment of a monopoly in the dye business through the ownership of all these German patents?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am coming to that, but will say now that such a monopoly, so far as the products covered by the German patents are concerned, would have been established if the Chemical Foundation had not been organized to purchase them to hold in trust for all Americans who produce or who desire to produce dyestuffs. Since the gentleman has called my attention to the Chemical Foundation Co., I will now take up its organization and its relation to the dye industry and the German patents. My friend MOORE has the Chemical Foundation and the Garvan rabies. [Laughter.] He has made several speeches on the floor of the House referring in criticism to Mr. Francis P. Garvan, the Alien Property Custodian and the president of the Chemical Foundation Co.

I want to say at the outset that I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] at first had reason for fearing or suspecting the Chemical Foundation Co., and I must confess upon the face of it, as it appeared to me without investigation, and as it appeared to several members of the committee and of the House, Democrats and Republicans, that the whole transaction of selling to Mr. Garvan and other officials serving under the Alien Property Custodian these 4,500 German patents did look suspicious. It looked suspicious to me, and that is the reason that induced me to go to the bottom of it and see whether there was anything on which to ground my suspicion or to justify it. Mr. MOORE attempted to do that, and he did have a most extensive hearing on the matter before the Ways and Means Committee. He called before the committee the parties to the transaction, the men who now have in their hands the stock of this Chemical Foundation Co., the men who control it, and he examined and cross-examined them, the men who were in any way connected with the transactions of the Chemical Foundation. I think he examined them for perhaps a week. I never saw a more rigid cross-examination in my life. He certainly had them on the stand two or three days, and he did go to the bottom of the matter and ascertaned every fact to the minutest detail connected with it, and when he got to the bottom of it I believe it was the judgment of every man on the committee that the bottom and all through to the bottom was just as clean as at the top, absolutely clean in every respect.

I never saw a single one of the fellows connected with the Alien Property Custodian or with the Chemical Foundation except Mr. Palmer in my life until this hearing before the committee. I never spoke to one of them, never saw one, and I doubt if I would know one if I should see him now. I suppose I would know Mr. Garvan, and I suppose I would know Mr. Choate, of whom I took particular notice, because the father of the latter gentleman was one of the most distinguished men the country ever produced, one of the most distinguished lawyers, and Mr. Choate is one of the most striking fellows you ever saw.

One thing impressed me about Mr. Choate. He looked like a strong, candid, frank fellow. He looked like a man of more than ordinary intellect and character, and he seemed in his testimony most candid and truthful in everything. He was the lawyer of this concern, the Chemical Foundation; he was on the stand about two days or more. I remember one thing I would remember him by. You see, this is a Republican committee, gentlemen; a majority of them were Republicans; Republicans control the committee, and the Republicans could put in what they wanted in the bill and we Democrats could not keep it out. When Mr. Choate was introducing himself to the committee he let the committee know that he had been a lifelong Republican; that all of his parents were Republicans; that his father and grandfather and all his family on both sides for generations back were Republicans; and that he was not only Republican by birth and association but from principle and everything else. I said, "Well, now, that is all right. That is bad enough; that is enough to impeach you, of course, but go ahead, we will not hold that against you." [Laughter on the Democratic side.] From that time Mr. Choate and myself became mutually very cordial. I have had several talks with him and also cross-examined him in the committee, and I want to say that a large majority of the men who have control of this Chemical Foundation are Republicans, lifelong Republicans. Even in spite of that, I looked into it most carefully and with the most rigid scrutiny and found that there was no sort of a suspicion on the part of anyone in this whole transaction, and I commend the patriotic spirit of these gentlemen, and I think you will, Republicans and Democrats, when I tell you the facts about it. Now, Germany did have 4,500 patents here which the Alien Property Custodian had in his possession. Some of them were very important patents—important to maintain this essential industry. Nobody knew what would be in the peace treaty about patents. In fact, I do not believe the war had ended. It was absolutely necessary from the investigation of the experts of the Alien Property Custodian's staff—and Mr. Garvan was one of them, Mr. Choate was one of them, and several others—they found it absolutely necessary for the people of this country to get hold of these in order to have a real established war industry; and they were right, it was necessary. Now, the question was, How could it be done? Because, if the war ended and the property—the patents—were still owned by Germany or her nationals, they would have to be turned back to Germany or her nationals and we could not get the benefit of them in this country. The formulas, the secrets, were locked up in those patents, and our laws protected Germany in those patents. Now, the only way to get them—for as long as the Government held them they would have to be turned back at the end of the war—was that Congress pass a law permitting the Alien Property Custodian to sell any or all of this property or patents to American citizens, not only patents but any other property. Congress did pass such a law. Now, these were important dye patents owned by Germany or her nationals. Gentlemen, it was most advisable for our people to get hold of those patents, most advisable, almost essential to an American dye industry. If the Government held them, they would go back to Germany upon the termination of the war. Now, this law permitted the Alien Property Custodian, with approval of the President, to sell the patents and all other property of German citizens in his possession. Now, they decided to sell under the act of Congress in order that this country might have the benefit of these patents. They started to sell at public sale. What did they find out? Let us see if they did not do the wise thing.

If they had been a crowd of crooks, they would have done the wrong thing, the unwise thing. But let us see as honest men if they did not do as you and I would have done. You know these men on the staff of the Alien Property Custodian had looked into these patents and knew what they were and how essential and how important they were and how valuable they were to an American dyestuff industry. They knew as no other people in this country would know. They had experts and they found out, they unearthed how many there were and what they were, what they covered, and it took months and months to unearth them. Germany had patents for dyes, explosives, poisonous gases, and all those things. Now, they decided, and wisely decided. As I said, I hold no brief for them in respect to this department or any other department; when they are right I am with them, and when they are wrong I am against them. I want to find out the truth. Now, let us see if they did not do what any business and patriotic man would do, and most of the men connected with the transactions were Republicans. I think they acted patriotically and wisely. If they had put them up at public sale, what would have been the result? Just one or two dye manufacturers—the Du Ponts, say, or one or two of the large textile and woolen industries—could have gotten together and pooled and put in one bid and gotten them practically for nothing, and procured thereby a private monopoly, and the balance of the dye and textile industries would have been completely in their control, and what would have been the result? That would have been an injustice to the other dye-producing and dye-using concerns of this country, would have been an injustice to the thousands of textile plants of this country, to permit these patents to be sold at public sale, to be bought up by a combination of a few. It would not be right or just. The Alien Property Custodian and other officials of the Government and the President decided to sell, and did sell, at private sale these German patents to the men who had unearthed them, who knew in every detail what they were and how essential they were to hold and use in trust for the equal benefit of the entire dyestuff-producing and dyestuff-using industry, to be enjoyed on equal terms by all, big and little alike, and also to prevent any private monopoly in them. So they resolved very properly not to put them up at public sale. The President by Executive order under the law authorized the custodian to sell at private sale. The custodian could have sold, Mr. MOORE says, for much more than $250,000. Yes; he could; but the Government would not have benefited by it; only the German owners would have benefited by a higher price. The custodian could have gone to some textile manufacturers or could have gone to the Du Ponts or other big dye plants and sold these patents for perhaps several million dollars; but such sale would have given them a monopoly and have made every other dye-producing and dye-using plant in the United States absolutely subject to their will, to be favored or discriminated against as they wished.

He did not sell them to every Tom, Dick, and Harry. Why? Because they would not know how essential they were to the Government in time of war and in time of peace, and they did not wish to sell them to anybody who did not know thoroughly of the ins and outs and the labyrinths of these intricate, complex German patents. Not one of these men that is a trustee of the Chemical Foundation ever suggested himself. But Mr. Palmer, with his staff of advisers, and the President thought the best thing was to have a corporation formed—the Chemical Foundation—and have the stock put into the hands of men who knew; the men who worked out these patents and had investigated German and foreign activities heretofore in this country.

They thought that Mr. Garvan should be at the head of this foundation. He was the man at the head of the investigation of the German activities and knew all about their patents, what they meant to the dye industry in this country. He knew how important it was that these patents should not go into the hands of a private monopoly; and there was Mr. Choate; and there were some other gentlemen. And so they were sold to the Chemical Foundation for $250,000. What was the purpose? In order for the Chemical Foundation or its stockholders or officers to make money? Not a particle. That was as far from the purpose and intention of Mr. Palmer and the President and these gentlemen on the staff of the Alien Property Custodian and the stockholders and officers of the foundation as the earth is from the sun. No such thought ever crossed the mind of anyone connected with it. So these men did form this Chemical Foundation, was incorporated, and there were appointed or elected as trustees and directors of it men that had been working with Mr. Palmer on these matters and were on his staff. Nobody outside knew what this meant to the industries of the United States. I believe with all my heart and conscience that every person or officer that was connected in any way with the transaction, and every trustee, every director, the president, vice president, and secretary of this Chemical Foundation, and every stockholder had no other purpose in this world in being connected with it except to serve the entire dye-producing, dye-using industries, and to prevent these patents going into private hands for the purpose of private monopoly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes more?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will yield the gentleman five minutes of my time if he will yield to me five of his later on.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right.

I said everyone connected with it has only one purpose and that is to serve the entire dye-manufacturing industry and dye-using industry without discrimination or favoritism, and no one has a purpose to serve himself or to make a penny out of it for himself.

I wanted to read just an extract from the hearings.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish to say that the time was yielded to the gentleman under misapprehension. The gentleman has used his 15 minutes extra. If he takes five minutes now, it would simply take that much time from this side.

Mr. KITCHIN. I gave you gentlemen an hour and three-quarters of our time, and you will still have 25 minutes if you give me five minutes now. I think it is manifestly just to these gentlemen.

I can not turn to the page right now. But this Chemical Foundation is controlled by five trustees. Every dollar of stock under the charter, under the written, signed, recorded agreement, must be turned over to the trustees and held 17 years, or until 1936, when these patents expire, and then anybody can have them, absolutely to be controlled by them for the benefit of the entire industry, to be enjoyed by all on equal terms and conditions.

These gentlemen are the trustees: Otto T. Bannard, chairman of the New York Trust Co. He was on the staff of Mr. Palmer. Hon. George L. Ingraham, late presiding justice, appellate division, first department, New York Supreme Court; Cleveland H. Dodge, Esq., one of the most prominent manufacturers and business men in the country; B. Howell Griswold, jr., Esq., of Alexander Brown & Sons, Baltimore, and Ralph Stone, Esq., president of the Detroit Trust Co., Detroit, Mich. The charter requires that every license they issue must be non-exclusive and issued to every American manufacturer on the same terms and at the same price and with the same charges in order to protect them. So the little manufacturer gets the benefit of them at the same price and terms as the big manufacturer, and they are required to issue it to every American citizen who desires to manufacture dyestuffs. These fellows are protecting the industry. Mr. Otto T. Bannard—what does he get out of this? He has not a dollar's worth of stock in it. What does he get as salary? Not a penny, and he never will get a penny. The same is true of Hon. George L. Ingraham. He does not get a cent and never will. Cleveland H. Dodge does not have a penny of stock, and not a penny of salary, and never can get a penny. Then there is B. Howell Griswold, jr. He has not a penny of stock, does not draw a penny of salary, and never will get any. Ralph Stone, not a penny, nor will he ever get any. They are all acting as a matter of patriotism and to protect the whole dye industry, to keep anybody from getting a monopoly, and, as I say, to protect the little as well as the big manufacturer. Each little producer can get the same terms and license to manufacture as the big industry. These gentlemen are the trustees, and they can elect the directors.

Now, there are three directors. The first is Francis P. Garvan, who is also president of it. He is the gentleman that has given the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] the rabies. There is not a man of higher character or loftier patriotism in the United States than Mr. Garvan. He is a man of exceptional wisdom and ability. There is not a more efficient or capable officer to-day in the service of the Government. The vice president is Col. Douglas I. McKay, and the treasurer and secretary is Mr. George J. Corbett, of the Central Union Trust Co. Does Mr. Francis P. Garvan get a penny out of it? He has not a dollar's worth of the stock. Does he want to make money on a big salary? He does not get a penny's salary, and never will, and he can not draw a single cent's salary under the agreement. He serves from the purest and most patriotic of motives. He is interested only in seeing established here a great American dye industry. He knew about these German patents and how they should be protected and how the whole American industry should be protected, and he worked the whole matter out, and that is the reason the trustees made him the president. It was he and Mr. McKay and Mr. Corbett who worked out and unearthed the German activities and these patents.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to know where the $250,000 is coming back from?

Mr. KITCHIN. They issue $500,000 of stock—$400,000 preferred—only $1,000 can be held by one person or corporation, and these dye manufacturers and other manufacturers that hold the stock in it can only get 6 per cent, but they have no more power of voting of the stock or issuing of a license or the terms of the license than you have, because by the charter and written agreement all the stock is turned over to these trustees upon certain trusts which I have mentioned.

Another provision in the charter and agreement is that when the foundation has made enough to take up, or when this Chemical Foundation takes up, this preferred stock, then all the net earnings of the foundation thereafter shall go for research work free; research work in chemical and allied sciences for the benefit of the Government and the industries of the whole country. It is not a money-making proposition at all. Of course, the foundation will charge for the license small royalties, and in this way the money invested in the stock or property will be returned to the stockholders.

Gentlemen, I am grateful for your patience and attention. [Applause.]

Let us Reduce the Army, Useless Appropriations for Rivers and Harbors, Cut Out the Hundred Thousand or More Useless Job Holders, Increase the Appropriation for Good Roads—Money Spent This Way Would Mean More to the American People Than Any Other Way.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. ROBSION,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13742) to amend sections 3 and 6 of the act of July 11, 1916, and sections 5 and 6 of the act of February 28, 1919.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, under leave granted to me I desire to call the attention of the House to the bill under consideration as well as other matters connected with the question of Federal aid for roads.

Under the acts of Congress certain moneys were appropriated to aid the States in the construction of public highways. Certain amount of this money must be taken up and appropriated by the States to which it was apportioned before July 1, 1920, and such State or States that fail to let contracts and have them approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, the money apportioned to them would go back to the Federal Treasury. Kentucky has failed to let contracts and have them approved by the Secretary of Agriculture for $736,000 of Federal aid, which has heretofore been set apart by the Federal Government to aid the State of Kentucky in the construction of roads. Some of the other States have likewise failed to take up their part of the Federal aid, while other States have taken up all of their Federal aid. This bill grants an extension of time of one year to the State of Kentucky and other States to take up what remains of the Federal aid which should have been taken up before July 1, 1920. Our Committee on Roads reported the bill favorably and unanimously. It should pass by all means. If it does not pass, my State will lose more than $700,000 of Federal aid, and other States will also lose a great deal of Federal aid. I urge every Member of the House to give this measure his vote and support.

FEDERAL AID ENDS JUNE 30, 1921.

Under the present laws $75,000,000 has been appropriated for Federal aid for the year beginning July 1, 1920, and ending June 30, 1921. Unless the Congress makes further appropriations Federal aid will cease July 30, 1921. This must not happen. I have introduced a bill which seeks to appropriate one billion of dollars for Federal aid for roads. Two hundred million would be spent each year for five years. Owing to the depleted condition of the Treasury and the sum of money already available, it has been thought wise by the Congress not to make any appropriations for roads in addition to what has already been appropriated at this time, but I desire to say to the Members of the House that I shall insist upon my bill or some other similar bill being taken up when the Congress convenes next December and ask that appropriations be made to continue this great work after June 30, 1921.

ROAD BUILDERS AND OFFICIALS INDORSE THIS PLAN.

Recently there appeared before our Committee on Roads State road commissioners and other road officials from something like two-thirds of the States of the Union. There is a plan on foot in the Nation under the Townsend plan or bill to construct two great national highways at the expense of the Government. One running across the continent east and west and the other running north and south. It is believed that this will kill the present plan for Federal aid for the States. I should like to see two great highways through the Nation; but if the Townsend plan must be adopted at the expense of the present system of Federal aid for the States I am strongly in favor of continuing the present plan. The present plan will mean much more to the road interest and the commercial interest of the Nation. My bill proposes to continue the present system of Federal aid for the States, but it increases the amount of this Federal aid. The Townsend plan would only aid a few States and the few counties through which this national highway would pass. My plan of Federal aid will aid every county in the Nation. Under this plan it is possible to construct good pike roads to every county seat of every county in the Nation. This is what the Nation needs and must have. We have been for years appropriating large sums of money for the Army and the Navy, and in the last few years we have appropriated large sums of money to maintain the railroads under Government control. With trucks and other means of rapid transportation, good roads will help solve the problem of transportation. Of the great many witnesses who appeared before our Committee on Roads, from nearly all of the States of the Union, they all agreed that the appropriations for roads was the most popular and most beneficial to the Nation as a whole of any appropriation.

GOOD ROADS WILL REDUCE COST OF LIVING.

Some of the best authorities of the Nation have stated that nearly one-half of the perishable food products of the Nation is wasted each year because of lack of good roads to get these food products to the market. A great campaign has been on for some time to induce people to return to the farms. Nothing would contribute more to this movement than good roads. Good roads will make better farms and better farmers. It will greatly increase production and the farmer can get his products to the market and to the people. We must increase production in this country. Good roads will help the church and school. It will make farm life more attractive. While Federal-aid appropriations have not been large, they have proved a wonderful incentive to road building throughout the Nation. We should foster and encourage this good-roads sentiment. Appropriations for good roads benefit nearly every person in the Nation, and above all it brings the benefits of Government to the farmers. They have been neglected too long. Let us have a smaller Army, less rivers and harbors appropriations, cut off thousands of useless job holders, and give more money toward the construction of good roads. I would rather vote money for good roads than for any other purpose. I have talked with a great many Members of Congress, and most of them entertain like views.

We passed the bill authorizing the farmers to organize and cooperate in the handling and selling of their products. Now, let us push the good-roads movement so they may have the means to get their products to market.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. FIELDS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920,

On House resolution 533, requesting the Federal Trade Commission to make certain inquiries into the prices of loose-leaf tobacco.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to secure through the Federal Trade Commission, created by law to perform such functions, information as to the cause in the decline of the prices of loose-leaf and other unmanufactured tobacco during the sale of the 1919 crop.

Tobacco is the chief money crop in my State and in portions of other States, and any condition that affects the price of the unmanufactured tobacco likewise affects the prosperity and well-being of the agricultural population of those sections. It is also one of the Government's greatest revenue producers, and any condition that affects the production of tobacco affects to an equal extent the revenues of the Government; and if the conditions that obtained during the sale of the 1919 crop continue, the production of tobacco must necessarily decrease, for the farmers can not live and produce tobacco at the prices received, in the main, for their 1919 crop. Therefore, the Government should be interested, as well as the farmer, in the undertaking proposed by the resolution which I have introduced and which is now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the conditions of which we complain are these: In the early market of the 1919 crop of tobacco the prices paid by the manufacturers or their agents were satisfactory to the tobacco producers, but within a few weeks the prices were reduced to figures far below the cost of production, and from the data furnished to me by tobacco growers and the managers of local tobacco markets it is apparent that that condition was brought about by manipulation among buyers. At least four of the large tobacco companies were represented on these markets, these being the American Tobacco Co., the Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., and the P. Lorillard Tobacco Co. There were others on some of the markets, but those referred to were generally represented and are referred to by the producers as the "Big Four."

For a few days, or possibly a few weeks, after the market for the 1919 crop opened there was competition between the agents of these companies, and, as I have previously stated, fair prices were paid, but ere long competition ceased, prices went down, and competition disappeared, notwithstanding the fact that the same buyers who had competed with each other a few days and weeks before were still on the same markets; but instead of bidding against each other for various grades, as they had previously done, an agreement seemed to have been reached between them or their firms whereby no two of them would bid on the same grades at the same time. One of them would bid on one or a given number of grades for a given period of time and the others would not bid on these grades, but would bid in the same manner on another grade or grades, no two of them bidding on the same grade or grades. This would continue for a few days and then they would alternate. The one who had first bid on grade A would bid on grade B; the one who had previously bid on grade B would bid on grade C; the one who had bid on grade C would go to grade D; and the one who had bid on grade D would bid on grade A; or on the smaller markets one of them would buy on one market one week, bidding on all grades without competition, while the others would likewise buy on other markets without competition, alternating from one market to another; but whichever way the scheme was manipulated it was done to the destruction of competition, leaving each buyer to offer any price that he might care to offer and leaving the producer at his mercy, without any remedy except to withdraw his tobacco from the market, which was soon found to be a dangerous policy, as tobacco that was withdrawn and later put up again seldom brought as much on the second bid as it had brought on the first bid; and, besides, the great bulk of tobacco is grown by tenant farmers or by landowners of limited means, who depend upon their tobacco crop to pay their expenses incurred while growing the crop and to carry them over to another crop. A large per cent of them were, therefore, unable financially to withdraw and withhold their crops from the market even had they felt inclined to do so, but were placed at the mercy of the manufacturers through the manipulations that I have just explained and were ruthlessly robbed by them. Much of the last year's crop sold at an average of 6 cents per pound, while it cost at the current prices of labor, feed, and other supplies essential to the growing and marketing of a crop 20 cents per pound to produce it, thereby bankrupting hundreds, yes, thousands, of farmers, both landowners and tenants. I am informed that thousands of tenants did not receive enough for their crops to pay their grocery bills, leaving them nothing with which to buy winter clothing for their families and other supplies necessary to their health and comfort.

Mr. Speaker, another evidence of the guilt of the manufacturers in manipulating the markets to their own advantage in violation of law is the concern manifested by their representatives here in Washington when I introduced this resolution. The resolution had hardly gotten out of the basket on the Speaker's table when the Washington correspondent of the American Tobacco Journal, a trust-owned paper published in New York, called me by phone to make inquiry about the resolution; then an attorney called me by phone to inquire about the contents and purpose of the resolution; then another attorney called me by phone and requested that I mail him a copy of the resolution; and then the Washington representative of the American Tobacco Journal called on me at my office and asked if he could discuss the matter with me. I told him he was at liberty to do so, and his first question was, "Is it your intention to push this resolution?" I assured him that I would prosecute the matter to the last ditch. He then asked me if I was not aware of the fact that the low rate of foreign exchange was responsible for the break in the tobacco market.

I told him that I was aware of the fact that the manufacturers had been handing that kind of bunk to the people, but I knew as well as he that it was absurd and without foundation so far as it applies to burley tobacco, approximately 90 per cent of which is manufactured and consumed within the United States and is therefore not affected by the rate of foreign exchange. I agreed with him that his contention might hold good so far as applicable to the black tobacco grown in western Kentucky and western Tennessee, 90 per cent of which is exported to Europe, were it not for the fact that that product is bringing on the average $4 less per hundred pounds than it brought during the war, when none of it could be exported for lack of shipping facilities. He could not deny the correctness of my contentions, nor did he attempt to do so. Again, when the resolution was reported to the House by the committee, that same gentleman called me by phone and asked me if I would please have my secretary mail a copy of the committee's report to the American Tobacco Journal. I mention these facts, Mr. Speaker, to show how much concern this resolution has caused the representatives and attorneys of the tobacco manufacturers, and will say in passing that if there was no guilt resting upon them or their companies, why would they be concerned about the resolution or the investigation which it proposes?

The resolution also attracted the attention of the Tobacco Growers and Dealers' Protective Association, whose members throughout the country have been robbed of the proceeds of their honest toil through the market manipulations of the Tobacco Trust. The association referred to issued an appeal through the Louisville Courier-Journal, covering a fourth of a page, to the tobacco growers of the country to forward to me data to use in support of the resolution, and at this point, Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert for the RECORD a copy of the association's appeal and a few of the letters received in support of the contentions that I have made. They read as follows:

[Courier-Journal Washington Bureau.]

HEARING THIS WEEK ON TOBACCO PRICES—FIELDS URGES GROWERS TO SEND HIM FACTS IN "BIG FOUR" PROBE.

WASHINGTON, April 10.

Hearings on the resolution of Representative W. J. FIELDS, Kentucky, for an investigation of the decline in prices of tobacco being paid by the "Big Four" will be held before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce next week, it was announced to-day.

Since he introduced the resolution, Mr. FIELDS has received many letters from growers in Kentucky and other States complaining of prices now being paid. One man said he sold part of his crop in the early days of the market at $42.25 to $46.75, but he was unable to get the rest of the same crop to market until early this year. Then he received $10.75 to $17.50.

Mr. FIELDS to-day requested that growers who have complaints furnish him with specific data setting forth the buyer, the market, and the prices paid. He will submit the data to the committee next week.

To the farmers and dealers in tobacco of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Tennessee:

Your attention is called to an article from Washington, published herewith, which speaks for itself. We request that the thousands of farmers and dealers who are vitally affected by the insidious actions of the so-called Tobacco Trust immediately write to Congressman W. J. FIELDS and acquaint him with the exact facts. Tell him how the various markets were conducted and exactly what happened when you disposed of your own crops. Let him know what prices were paid for a small proportion of the crop and relate what occurred shortly after the season opened. Give him specific facts—and where a portion of the crop was sold early and the balance after the slump, state the exact difference in averages. Tell him who was the principal buyer on your local market and how the different buyers for the "Big Four" performed on markets which you are acquainted with.

Don't postpone writing or telegraphing, but do so at once. This is exceedingly vital and must be acted upon immediately. Let every man do his duty and furnish all information possible. There are thousands among you whose tobacco sold for less than cost of production. Sit down, write the facts, and present the matter at Washington.

Hon. W. J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith the commissioner of agriculture's report, on sales of leaf tobacco for the month of March, and wish to call your particular attention to the fact that 27,283,368 pounds owned by farmers was sold for an average of $11.36 per hundredweight, viz, about 11 cents per pound.

In view of the fact that tobacco can not be produced for less than 18 cents to 20 cents per pound, it would appear that an effort should be made at once to relieve such a condition. Also that an investigation should be undertaken to ascertain wherein the fault lies.

Thanking you for your efforts in behalf of the tobacco growers and dealers of Kentucky, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

H. B. GORIN.

The report follows:

NEW TOBACCO PRICES TUMBLE.

FRANKFORT, KY., April 13, 1920.

Tobacco sold during March at Kentucky warehouses totaled 52,704,158 pounds and brought $6,923,853 to the growers for an average of 16.34 cents a pound for old crop and 13.03 for 1919 crop, according to the report of W. C. Hanna, commissioner of agriculture. Several months ago the general average was above 35 cents. New crop burley averaged but 12.71 cents and represented 33,281,450 pounds of the total sales. The poor quality of the 1919 crop caused the average price for that kind to be lower than that for the older tobacco. The month's average of 13.03 cents for the 1919 crop is believed to be the lowest in many years.

THE BLUE GRASS STOCK FARMS,
Berry, Ky., April 15, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FIELDS: In reference to House resolution 506, submitted by you in the House of Representatives on March 27, 1920, we beg to advise that we heartily applaud your efforts to have an investigation made to determine the cause of the sudden decline during the latter days of the tobacco market in Kentucky and elsewhere. This is a question that vitally concerns the farmers of your district, as well as farmers wherever tobacco is depended upon as the main crop. The situation demands immediate attention, and therefore we urgently implore every House Member interested in agriculture to give ear to your resolution, and that same be passed without delay. Even Members who hail not from tobacco States will, we hope, in the interest of reciprocity, vote to pass the resolution. We are large tobacco growers, operating two large estates, and submit the following data for the consideration of all concerned:

Cost of farm labor in Kentucky is $3 per day.

Hay with which to feed horses necessary to the culture of tobacco is $40 per ton.

Corn, $2 per bushel.

In the early days of the market of 1919 we sold several loads of tobacco for an average of $46.75 and $42.25. From the same identical crop, marketing tobacco of identical quality, we sold in the latter days of the market (1920) the balance of our tobacco, which we could not get ready for the market earlier owing to the scarcity of farm labor, at averages of $10.75 and $17.50. Understand the tobacco marketed early was of the same quality as that sold later. We would like to know the reason for the decline in price so that proper remedies may be applied. We can not possibly raise tobacco during the present times for less than 20 cents per pound and break even. Thirty cents a pound, even, would allow us a very small margin of profit.

Respectfully, your friend,

T. H. HUTTON,
Advertising Manager.

THE NEW CENTRAL HOTEL,
Maysville, Ky., April 10, 1920.

Hon. W. J. FIELDS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just had a letter from Mr. Luban Phelps, of Louisville, with a copy of your bill, 506, which I am glad to acknowledge as a good move. And wish you success in its passage and the bringing of certain tobacco companies to justice, both before the courts and in honest treatment, man between man, on the market.

The tobacco crop here—in more than half of the crops where tenants get half—has not paid the tenants for stripping and hauling to the market, many crops selling as low as 3 and 4 cents. Several million pounds of this tobacco is being held by speculators, and unless it can find a purchaser it will come into next crop and paralyze the situation entirely. And for this reason I am asking you to try and use your influence to get the proposed loan to France and Italy through, that they may be able to buy tobacco and relive a much distressed condition here that will grow much worse unless it can be done. And it is driving the labor all away from the farm and decreasing other farm products. The sooner this can be done the better, as conditions in this section of the country are extremely bad. Around Lexington the conditions are good, where all of the crop was bright. Should the money be loaned those countries in the next few days it will bring relief and help to keep labor on the farm.

Wishing you success and promising you to do anything I can to assist you, I am,

Yours, very truly,

A. M. PENN.

MAPLEWOOD FARM,
Danville, Ky., April 11, 1920.

Hon. W. J. FIELDS.

DEAR SIR: During the month of January, 1920, I put two loads of tobacco—about 5,000 pounds—on the floor of the People's Warehouse of Danville, Ky., which averaged 80 cents per pound. About 30 days after—on February 17—I sent in two more loads of about the same weight and very much the same quality, which only brought half the price of the first two loads, and being rather dissatisfied with the prices thought I would reject one basket through curiosity, so I tore up ticket and had it put on sale next day. On the 17th this basket of 280 pounds sold for 13½ cents per pound, amounting to $37.80, and the same basket was reweighed at only 275 and sold for $143.40 next day. The warehouse people nor buyers could not explain to me how it could happen that the same basket brought $37.80 one day and $143.40 the next day, a difference of $105.60 in one day, or nearly three times as much.

The only information I could get was from men familiar with the tobacco business that the company which bought the tobacco the first day were very short on that particular grade and through courtesy the other buyers would not bid against their buyer until he got caught up. I had about 10 or 15 more baskets that I should have rejected and gotten a thousand dollars more money than I did, as some only brought 10½ cents that sold before and after for same quality at around 90 cents. Some one robbed me, that's all I know for sure.

Yours, etc.,

GEO. F. ANDERSON.

All the big four buyers were on the market those two days and several others.

W. J. FIELDS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The tobacco condition in this section of the State is getting to be fierce. Tobacco opened up at a good price; for a time sold as high as $25 to $30; it has now fallen to $2, $5, $10, and $12. One good crop sold a few days ago at $2, $6, and $10. Quite a lot of the unsold has no market at any price.

Our people may have acted unwisely in not selling early, but that now is a fixed fact and can't be helped.

Do all you can to afford relief. Don't see how our tobacco growers can possibly get by with the high prices prevailing for supplies, stock, food, etc.

Sincerely,

S. R. GLENN.

SPRINGDALE, KY., April 13, 1920.

Hon. W. J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Received copies of H. Res. 506, in regard to prices of tobacco.

Having studied over the matter and talked with many tobacco growers, I can reach no other conclusion than a combine of buyers for the different manufacturers agreeing to pay certain prices. They paid the high price for the grade of tobacco of which there was very little.

The same grade of tobacco from my farm that brought 40 cents in 1918 brought 20 cents February, 1920.

I thank you for the interest in Kentucky farmers.

Very truly,

Dr. C. L. GRAHAM.

Representative W. J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.:

In response to your request through the Courier-Journal for information in regard to tobacco prices, I will gladly furnish you with the following information:

The first of last December I sold part of a crop of tobacco at Horse Cave for $37.50 per hundred and was unable to get the remainder on the market until last of February, and it brought 6 cents. I rejected it and sold the next week, and it brought less than 6 cents. Then I hauled it back home and hung it in the barn. I think it time for tobacco market to be put on steady basis.

Yours, very truly,

W. E. PAYTON.

TRENTON, KY., April 13, 1920.

The TOBACCO GROWERS AND DEALERS' ASSOCIATION:

DEAR SIRS: In regard to my tobacco crop, the market here opened up very well, but in a short while it fell down to nothing. I sold my tobacco on the West loose floor, Hopkinsville, Ky. I didn't want to sell that way, but the market was getting so bad I thought it best. I couldn't get any buyers to look at my tobacco. My crop sold from 5 cents to 24 cents, at an average of 17 cents.

The market is getting worse all the time.

Have taken notice of the market from the start, and the buyers have taken it time about. Some will buy a while and they will quit, and some more will buy a while.

I could of made more money to not raise this crop.

Yours, very truly,

L. R. BEDWELL.

Congressman WILLIAM J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your request printed in the Courier Journal, Monday, April 12, about the situation of the tobacco crop:

I was offered by Mr. T. E. Farmer, buying for McMurry, of Springfield, Tenn., $28.50 around for my tobacco in December, 1919. I didn't sell, as I expected more.

He offered me $20 and $10 in March for the same crop, in good condition, and we haven't been able to get a buyer out to look at our crops.

The loose-leaf floors are about the only places they will go, so you just don't get anything hardly when you go there.

We certainly need something done to help the farmers in our vicinity.

Yours, very truly,

J. E. EVANS, Jr.

TRIBUNE, KY., April 14, 1920.

Hon. W. J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We find statement in Courier Journal concerning the slump in the tobacco prices. I sold my first load of tobacco as high as $40 per hundred, the next two loads down to $18 per hundred, and the next load as low as $10 per hundred. This tobacco grew in the same field, fired in the same barn, all the same size, color, and body, and was sold over the loose-leaf floor at Providence, Webster County, Ky. The tobacco companies represented on this floor were the Imperial Tobacco Co., the Galohier (Ltd.), and the Taylor & Hodge Co. These buyers would guarantee some farmers so many dollars for their tobacco and pass the tobacco over the floor and bid it off at a high price to fool the farmers. Not only that, but the buyers would have a man outside the door to buy it on the wagons and pass it over the floor and make the tobacco bring $10 or $15 per hundred more, and many other swindling games were worked on the farmer, and that is what was done at Mayfield, Ky., that caused all that trouble. The farmers have been made slaves so long they have decided to come from under the masters of the so-called Tobacco Trust, and if you lawmakers ever aim to do anything for the farmers, now is the time. Next year might be too late. The people here are about ready for a break, and a few level-headed men are trying to keep it down, and if you folks at Washington don't do something pretty soon you need not wonder at the future. What I have told you are facts and can prove it. Please do something if you can.

RIVERSIDE FARM,

W. J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your ad in the Courier-Journal in regard to tobacco will say the market has gone bad. Tobacco that sold for $30 per hundred at first will bring now from $10 to $26 for the leaf and from $2 to $9 for lugs. Was on the Springfield market yesterday. Will phone me; said going down every day. The buyers at Adairville are Morrow & Orand, Rice, and True & Snider. I think Morrow buying Tandy. Rice for Hock & Co. Not more than 50 per cent sold, I don't think, around Adairville. The farmers would love to see something done to relieve the pressure. I can't see anything to cause this state of affairs unless they have combined, which every one else thinks. Crops that sold for 30 to 34 around won't bring 20 now. With best regards, I am,

Yours, truly,

W. B. TYLER.

CALVERT CITY, KY., April 14, 1920.

Mr. W. J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I notice a request from you in the Courier-Journal to write you of the tobacco situation.

The buyers now are only offering 6, and 12 is the prevailing price. Mr. Coffman, buyer for American Snuff Co. (snuff people, as we call them), is only allowed to buy on our side of Clarks River; then only four crops per week, and not to go to any farmer's barn unless requested. This was told me by man on my land that has tobacco to sell. Mr. Provine, buyer for Stahel & Hayden, at Paducah, has been in my store twice in last two weeks, and Mr. Provine did not ask me if I wanted to sell, and he only will stop and look at any one's tobacco unless asked to do so, and no other buyer has bought any here, but been to railway here; made one trip. One John Flowers, buyer for Hodges Tobacco Co., said to me was not trying to buy; was just looking. This was week before last. Would pay 6 to 16 for best tobacco. Mr. Provine told me I had one barn of good tobacco; two weeks past could have bought it; now he could not. This was last week. I have some 75,000 pounds; bad conditions here.

Yours, truly,

LEE COX.

ROUTE 15, JEFFERSONTOWN, KY., March 15, 1920.

W. J. FIELDS,
Washington City.

DEAR SIR: The growers have been requested to present you with the conditions existing on the various loose-leaf markets. At Shelbyville, Shelby County, Ky., the market opened with an average around 50 cents on December 10, 1919. The average report will show that this remained about three weeks. About January 1 the decline was about one-half this price. I sold tobacco at Shelbyville about the 18th of December. Some averaged 35 cents, some 40 cents. On January 2, 1920, I sold tobacco grown on the same land at an average of 13 cents per pound. There was practically no competition between the buyers on the grades they were buying after the first two or three weeks. The American buyer, after the first few weeks, stopped buying but continued to be present at the sales in line with the other buyers. They continued paying a high price for a basket occasionally—in order to fool the people, I suppose.

Respectfully, yours,

W. H. THOMPSON.

GUTHRIE, KY., April 17, 1920.

Congressman W. J. FIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

YOUR HONOR: Please permit me to inform you of the present condition (in Tennessee) of the tobacco market.

The buyers here have gone into a combine. They are forcing the farmers to haul their tobacco to loose-leaf floors, where it is sold to the highest bidder. The buyers will not bid against each other. The buyers pretend to be bidding against each other but are only fooling the farmer. They refuse to buy from the wagon or from the barn. The loose-leaf dealer is making as high as $500 per day. This comes out of the farmers' tobacco, which brings a very small price, a price which is far below the cost of production. There is no competition whatever. We are at their mercy, which they fail to extend.

I was needing a little money to pay some debts which I made in producing this tobacco. I saw in the paper that tobacco was selling for a good price on the floor at Clarksville, Tenn., so I took some over; 2,100 pounds sold for 14 cents per pound, 300 pounds at 5 cents per pound, 450 at 2 cents per pound. Now, this was a good quality of tobacco. The man that bought my tobacco last year, paying me 25 cents round price for the whole crop, said that my crop this year was far ahead of the one I had the year before. The tobacco that I sold on the floor which I have spoken of averaged 11 cents. There must be something done at once to relieve the farmers in this section or the country will be bankrupt.

I have tried to lay a few of the circumstances before you. If you can help us in any way it will be appreciated.

Yours, very respectfully,

EDWARD CAMPBELL.

HORSE CAVE, KY.

Hon. W. J. FIELDS,
Washington.

MY DEAR SIR: Some time ago I noticed in the Courier-Journal that the investigation against the Tobacco Trust was held up for want of more direct proof as to the slump of prices. I herewith hand you this, which is substantially correct. The dates can be found if necessary. Some time in November, 1919, I began to buy tobacco on the Horse Cave loose-leaf floor, and at that date I bought two baskets—one short, bright leaf at 28 cents, and one bright trask at 41 cents. In December these two baskets were put back on floor for resale. The 28-cent brought 17 cents; the 41-cent brought 27 or 28 cents. They were rejected and placed back on floor, after being brightened up in March. The 28-cent brought 6 cents; the 41-cent brought 7¼ cents. The warehouse books will show that these baskets were never removed from the floor till after the last sale. If need be an affidavit will be given. The farmer needs some relief if possible.

Sincerely, yours,

W. W. MCPHERSON.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I think the data submitted is not only sufficient to warrant the investigation asked for but also sufficient to prove conclusively that violations of the antitrust laws have been committed by the tobacco manufacturers or their agents to the end that producers of tobacco have been willfully and ruthlessly robbed; and while that condition prevails the American Tobacco Co. declares a stock dividend of 75 per cent, as shown by an article I clipped from a New York paper and which reads:

STOCK DIVIDEND OF 75 PER CENT BY AMERICAN TOBACCO CO.

[By Associated Press.]

NEW YORK, April 14, 1920.

Directors of the American Tobacco Co. to-day announced a common-stock dividend of 75 per cent, payable to holders of class B common stock of record July 15.

A special meeting of stockholders was called for May 6 to approve the action.

If this resolution is passed, I shall do all in my power to assist the Federal Trade Commission in its investigation, and if the investigation discloses the guilt of the tobacco trust or its agents sufficient to warrant an indictment under the antitrust laws, I shall do all in my power to secure the indictment and conviction of the guilty—not alone for the purpose of redressing as far as possible the wrongs already committed but to prevent a repetition of these wrongs in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

National Highways.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. SUMMERS,
OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the question of a definite and permanent national highway policy is one of the important problems which Congress has not yet satisfactorily solved and one in which the people of every community in our great country are deeply interested, because of the many blessings of good roads to both the producer and the consumer in business and recreation.

Everyone is in favor of good roads, and it seems to me that more attention should be given to the matter of a national highway policy. I do not mean to disparage the splendid work which has been done by our Roads Committees of the Senate and House, by the various national highway organizations, or by our State highway departments, but I believe that Congress has not yet given its best thought to this great problem.

We now have in operation a "Federal aid" plan of road construction, by which the Nation joins with the State in financing the work on a fifty-fifty basis. It was a big step in the right direction, but can we improve upon it? Can we still further coordinate and unify the great movement of highway building? Can we find and adopt a plan which will be permanent, which the States will indorse whole-heartedly; a plan that will appeal to the business sense of the taxpayer?

I believe this can be accomplished, but I do not deign to offer either suggestion or criticism at this time. However, we are about to adjourn this session of Congress, and even though there is a political campaign ahead I hope that by careful study of this problem during the intervening weeks we will be prepared to satisfactorily deal with it during the next session.

For this reason I desire to call attention to a comparison of the present "Federal aid" plan and the Townsend bill; also to the resolutions of the convention of State highway officials at Louisville, Ky., last December, together with some facts and figures in connection therewith.

THE FEDERAL AID PLAN.

Embodied in what was known as the Shackleford Act, the "Federal aid" plan was enacted into law July 11, 1916, and has certainly proved a great constructive measure. By it there was appropriated the sum of $5,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and an amount greater by $5,000,000 for each succeeding year until for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the sum of $25,000,000 was appropriated, the total amount for the three-year period to be expended outside of forest reserves being $75,000,000. It also appropriated $10,000,000 for forest roads to be expended at the rate of $1,000,000 per year for 10 years. Then the Sixty-fifth Congress amended the act so as to make its administration more liberal to the States and greatly increased the amounts appropriated.

The act provided that the moneys appropriated were to be used for new construction, but this was defined so as to include reconstruction and improvement. The Government pays half of the expense, and the other half is paid by the State, the work being done under supervision of the highway departments of the several States, each of which obligates itself to keep "properly maintained" the roads constructed, and this was defined as meaning "the making of needed repairs and the preservation of a reasonably smooth surface, considering the type of road," but not "extraordinary repairs or reconstruction." As a result, many miles of fine roads have been built, but the work has only commenced.

INCREASED APPROPRIATIONS URGED.

Last fall a large delegation of good-roads men from the Western States came to Washington to discuss the problem of how best to continue the Federal aid plan of highway construction, and later there was held in Louisville, Ky., a convention of State highway officials. This convention passed a set of resolutions urging the continuance of the Federal appropriations for road building on an enlarged scale, and also urged some changes in the apportionment of funds so that the public-land States should have a more equitable share, which apportionment they based on the nontaxable status of public lands and the permanent withdrawal of forest reserves from taxation and settlement. On the whole, however, the resolutions contemplated the continuance of the basic ideas of the Federal aid plan.

Finally, the 12 Western public-land States sent a delegation, some 30 in number, to Washington early this year. This delegation appeared before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and urged an appropriation of $300,000,000 for the continuance of Federal aid for three years on the original plan, but with the changes last suggested and not tying the plan necessarily to the Department of Agriculture. They also urged an additional $100,000,000 for roads and trails in the national forests, to be expended at the rate of $10,000,000 per year.

It can be readily figured from the above explanation that the total amount of the appropriations expended and expendable for the three years ending June 30, 1920, is one hundred and eighty-five millions, and that the total amount appropriated by existing laws is two hundred and eighty-nine millions.

THE NEW APPORTIONMENT PLAN.

The Federal aid acts adjusted apportionments between the States on a basis of the differences in their proportionate area, population, and existing postal road mileage and provided for the distribution of funds as follows: One-third in the ratio which the area of each State bears to the total area of all the States, one-third in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, and one-third in the ratio which the mileage of rural delivery routes and star routes in each State bears to the total mileage in all the States.

Now, the Louisville resolutions of the State highway officials propose the road funds shall be apportioned as follows:

> The percentage which the patented land area bears to the total area of a State shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture; the 50 per cent now required as such State's portion of cooperation shall be multiplied by the resultant percentage as above determined, and the figures obtained will be the minimum percentage which each State shall be required to furnish of the total of any Federal aid project.

To figure the 50 per cent in the first place, however, the original plan of apportionment would be followed.

In this connection it is most interesting to note the areas of public land and forest reserves in the 12 public-land States, and these are shown in the following table, for which I am indebted to figures compiled by Hon. WILLIAM N. VAILE, of Colorado:

States.	Area.	Public land.	Forest reserves.	National parks.
	Sq. miles.	Acres.	Acres.	Acres.
Arizona	113,956	22,309,100	11,154,923	.....
California	158,297	19,505,217	18,814,659	963,316
Colorado	103,948	10,416,317	13,280,832	271,376
Idaho	83,888	14,316,108	17,606,792	.....
Montana	146,997	11,818,414	15,957,196	2,142,720
Wyoming	97,914	26,759,500	8,384,174	915,060
Nevada	110,690	55,246,831	4,971,335
New Mexico	112,634	21,063,165	8,294,222	.....
Oregon	96,699	13,850,755	13,118,680	159,360
Utah	84,990	31,540,671	7,415,551	.....
Washington	69,127	1,283,319	9,940,372	107,360
South Dakota	77,615	1,010,773	1,090,075	10,552
	1,276,755	229,120,170	128,028,770	4,669,654

It may be seen from this table that the entire public-land acreage in those States is a grand total of 351,818,594 acres, or 43 per cent of the entire area of those States, and that of this amount 122,698,424 acres, or 11.9 per cent, of the entire area is forest-reserve and national-park land, which will never go into private ownership or become taxable.

THE TOWNSEND BILL.

The Townsend bill, S. 3572, proposes a substantial increase in appropriations by authorizing an expenditure of $425,000,000 for the four fiscal years beginning July 1, 1920, and ending June 30, 1924. Of this $50,000,000 is to be immediately available; $75,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and the balance at the rate of $100,000,000 per year for ensuing three years. This is practically the same plan of expenditure as urged by the western road delegation here early in February, and it is pointed out in support of the Louisville resolutions and plan of apportionment that each of the public-land State legislatures convenes in biennial session in January, 1921; that at these sessions the financing of road construction for the next two years will have to be decided.

But the Townsend bill has other features, and whether it is enacted into law or not at this time these other features have so many adherents that it is well to consider them.

It would place national construction in the hands of a commission of five men appointed by the President, with the approval and consent of the Senate, and with final power to accelerate the use of funds along sound and economical lines. This commission would investigate the principles of transportation and locate and construct highways to meet the requirements of future traffic and would concentrate national funds on a selected system of mileage. The commission would consult State highway departments with respect to the location of links of the national system, but leaves the final power of selection in the hands of the commission.

The bill has a primary purpose to provide the Nation with a connected network of highways which would serve as effective agencies in time of war. It further provides that the National Government must forever maintain all national highways, and also provides for uniform regulations of traffic on national highways. All roads under this act would be 20 feet wide. The overhead expense would be about 5 per cent, but undoubtedly a complete system of national highways would be created, constructed, and maintained and roads would not be built here and there according to purely local interests.

RELATION TO PRODUCTION.

As once suggested by former Secretary of Commerce Redfield, the advocates of highway traffic only aspire to supplement their elder brothers in transportation, the railways and the merchant marine, in a transportation trinity. The close relation of all three of these traffic factors seems definitely established.

Our merchant marine maintains our contact with the rest of the world and moves freight over our rivers and inland waterways. The railroad has long heralded development and progress, while the highways offer an infinite possibility of local communication. The highway aids the railways in the immense task of serving 110,000,000 persons spread over 3,000,000 square miles. They directly touch the home life of more people than all other transportation mediums combined.

In our domestic commerce freight now moves over 15,000 miles of canals and inland waterways, 259,000 miles of railways, and 2,753,334 miles of highways, but the distribution functions of the latter present potentials not generally understood. It is said the total of surfaced roads in the United States is greater than the railroad mileage, being 296,290, or 12 per cent of the public highway total, against 259,000 miles of railroad. Many miles of the highways, however, are not always passable. Exact tonnage figures are difficult to obtain, but I have heard reliable estimates of 125,000,000 tons on inland waterways in 1918, while in the same year 2,504,000,000 tons were moved by rail and 1,200,000,000 tons by motor truck. This proves the economic value of highways, in addition to their other values, and yet our late Food Administrator is authority for the statement that 50 per cent of the perishable farm produce in the United States rots on the ground because of the farmer's inability to get it to market.

In the year 1918 our agricultural crops, dairy products, produce, and domestic animal production reached an aggregate of more than $21,000,000,000. There were 5,638,000,000 bushels of cereals, 11,818,000 bales of cotton, 309,109,000 bushels of potatoes, 197,360,000 bushels of apples, 6,549,000 tons of sugar beets, 10,500,000,000 pounds of pork, 589,000,000 head of poultry, 1,921,000,000 dozen of eggs, and 8,429,000,000 gallons of milk. There are $70,000,000,000 invested in farms of the United States, a sum equal to the total of any three other industries that might be named, and I firmly believe that one of the prime reasons for high costs of things is inability to deliver maximum production at prices permitting a profit to the farmer and a saving to the consumer. Waste, due to unimproved roads, is already estimated, by figures developed in a congressional investigation, to reach the appalling sum of more than $500,000,000 per year, and yet it is proposed to spend only three or four hundred millions on roads in the next few years.

If we want to speed up production, if we want to reduce the high cost of living, if we want to reduce taxes, if we want to pay off our big war debt in the fewest possible years, let us build good roads, roads that will stand up under present-day traffic, roads that will be connected together in a great national system.

On the day when passage of necessary legislation by Congress provides for a definite system of national highways with a program of appropriations ample for their speedy construction the national life of our country will receive an impetus beyond the vision of any of us. Let us recognize the mistakes of the past and pledge ourselves to a clear and forward vision of the future.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES B. ASWELL,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, three days ago I presented to the House a list of many of the great constructive Democratic measures I have actively supported and aided in passing for the good of the people, some of which I helped write.

The South is honoring herself and contributing mightily to the return of normal conditions in the social and economic life of the Nation. The South to-day in this great crisis of reconstruction is the balance wheel of the Republic. That great and honorable class of citizens known as farmers are primarily responsible for this wholesome attitude. Other sections are demoralized and dominated by the spirit of the "red," but the South, true to her traditions, moves forward steadily and grandly, firm in the faith of her ability, willing and eager to do her full part in the Nation's readjustment.

Knowing the farmers are always loyal Americans, asking no special favors, but mightily opposed to special privileges to any class, demanding rightly but one thing—a square deal—I stand vigorously for the farmers' right to buy collectively at a fair price and to sell their products at a fair price, without being subjected to one-man decision, and to borrow money on long terms at a low rate of interest, which must be realized by legislation by the Federal Government. There is no middle ground. Every man in this House must stand up and be counted for or against the farmers. The Federal land banks, the rural credit system, and so forth, were meant for this definite purpose, but red tape and legal delay have discouraged borrowers and delayed action to help the farmers where help was most needed. The loan systems were new and experimental, but by experience we now know the need of immediate remedial legislation for the farmers. The various boards in charge need an awakening. How do you Republican leaders in temporary control of Congress stand on this vital matter? Stand up and be counted, I challenge you! You have done nothing in this Republican-controlled Congress to help the farmer or in any way to reduce the high cost of living or to reduce taxes, and have not permitted Democrats to initiate action. You depend upon the war profiteer for campaign expenses. The Democrats and the country hold you to account. What do you answer? Let the people answer, as they will, in November.

Through the trackless wilderness of a World War, where no American legislator had before traveled, no man had sufficient vision to know instantly the right way in every emergency. Conscientious and purposeful men grappled the problems with unrelenting energy, but who could know with a divine certainty that all was done for the best? Only the future can tell. I have studied every step of the way and done my honest best to serve effectively my constituents and my country. The results speak for themselves.

All men who work vigorously to accomplish results make mistakes. I am not an exception. I do not claim to have made no mistakes in the past nor to make none in the future, but I have eagerly tried all the way to do the right thing. I shall continue in this purpose to serve.

It is axiomatic that honest men even of the same party faith do not all agree at all times on governmental policies. So no man in public office need hope to receive the approval of all his constituents when he is called upon to take a stand on any public question, whether it be local or national, large or small. On this point I can honestly say that with the lights before me I have faithfully tried to serve those whom I have the honor to represent and for whom I vote and speak in this House. I have earnestly labored to be useful to my constituents in every way possible. I have sought to comply with every request for service which has come to me. I have answered promptly letters received from men, women, and children in my district, and whether matters mentioned by them were great or small, important or unimportant, whether they came from rich or poor, each and all have received my best effort and their business has been my chief concern.

Every citizen of the eighth Louisiana district who has called upon me for any service will bear testimony that I have responded cheerfully, faithfully, and promptly. I believe all our splendid service men, their wives and mothers, will gladly tell you that I have been their champion. I have served the farmer, the home owner, the laborer, the business man, the high and the low—all my constituents, regardless of name, faction, or position.

I have not been content to perform merely the ordinary duties of a Member of Congress in legislative matters; I have eagerly sought daily opportunities for personal service, and I have failed in no instance to do everything in my power to secure the very best possible results. To this hundreds of my fellow citizens at home will testify.

In my congressional work I find my greatest happiness in the joy of service.

Governmental Control and Operation of the Telephone, Telegraph, and Marine Cable Systems.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. B. ROUSE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of the constitutional authority vested in it by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives enacted July 16, 1918, provided that the President may take possession and assume control of the telegraph, telephone, and marine cable or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and operate the same in such manner as may be useful or desirable for the duration of the war. Acting under this resolution, the President by proclamation took possession and assumed the operation of the telegraph and telephone systems August 1, 1918, and on November 2, 1918, of the cable systems. The latter were operated for a period of six months and were returned to their owners on May 2, 1919. The telephone and telegraph systems were operated for a period of one year, and returned to their owners at midnight on July 31, 1919.

An impression of the magnitude and the character of this gigantic undertaking may be gained from the following:

Miles of wire	28,827,091
Number of telephones	11,713,228
Estimated number of messages or talks	21,842,425,620
Number of public exchanges	21,174
Number of employees	262,622
Salaries and wages paid	$175,668,299
Income from all sources	$391,476,926
Expenses and fixed charges	$319,116,293
Value of plant and equipment	$1,492,230,081

Of telegraph companies there were 14 which came under the joint resolution of July 16, 1918. These are:

The Western Union Telegraph Co., of New York.
The Postal Telegraph-Cable System, of New York.
The Canadian Pacific Railway Co., of Montreal (operating a commercial telegraph system).
The Central Idaho Telegraph & Telephone Co., of Weiser, Idaho.
The Colorado & Wyoming Telegraph Co., of Denver.
The Continental Telegraph Co., of Chicago.
The Federal Telegraph Co., of San Francisco.
The Marthas Vineyard Telegraph Co., of Woods Hole, Mass.
The Mountain Telegraph Co., of Denver.
The North American Telegraph Co., of Minneapolis.
The Northern Telegraph Co., of Bangor, Me.
The Philadelphia, Reading & Pottsville Telegraph Co., of Philadelphia.
The Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., of Dallas, Tex.
The Vermont International Telegraph Co., of St. Johnsbury, Vt.

All of these companies, with the possible exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., of Montreal, were recognized as a part of the national system of telegraphs and telephones for the operation of which, during the year of Federal control, the Postmaster General is responsible.

The following cable companies were operating in the United States:

Western Union Telegraph Co.
Commercial Cable Co.
Commercial Pacific Cable Co.
Mexican Telegraph Co.
Commercial Cable Co. of Cuba.
Central and South American Telegraph Co.
United States and Hayti Telegraph & Cable Co.
French Telegraph-Cable Co.
German Atlantic-Telegraph Co.

The total value of the properties involved was more than one and one-half billion dollars.

The operation of these telephone, telegraph, and cable systems was under the supervision of the Postmaster General, Albert S. Burleson. These properties were operated during a period of war, under such abnormal conditions as had never heretofore existed. Increased costs of operation had been absorbed to the fullest extent; wages and rates had not been increased to meet the war conditions; the costs of labor and materials were increasing rapidly, and the efficiency of the service was rapidly decreasing when these properties were taken over by the Government. Notwithstanding these extraordinary conditions, the telephone and telegraph systems were efficiently operated and with less increase in rates than that of any other public utility during the war period; and with a cost of central organization during the entire period of Government control of less than two one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the revenues. There was a deficit of only $14,000,000, involving a business of approximately $600,000,000; and there would have been no deficit had it not been for the injunctions obtained by the State public utility commissions in many of the States against the slight increases in rates. The Supreme Court of the United States having decided that the Postmaster General had the authority to increase the rates, had the properties continued under governmental control, but a few months longer no deficit in their operation would have resulted. The owners of the properties were paid just compensation for the use of their properties, as required by the resolution of the Congress; and the properties were returned to their owners intact, without confusion, with their working organizations unimpaired, and their financial stability not impaired but strengthened in many instances.

No corporation or other business was managed more successfully than this gigantic undertaking. It is a remarkable achievement that under such extraordinary conditions this vast business was so successfully managed.

In a report, July 15, 1919, to the shareholders of the company representing nearly 80 per cent of the entire telephone service—the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.—is found the following from its president, the then greatest living wire expert:

It is gratifying now to say that your property has been maintained and will be returned in as good first-class condition as though it had never been out of your possession.

The following is taken from a resolution unanimously adopted at the national convention of the United States Independent Telephone Association, representing the remainder of the telephone service of the country:

Be it resolved by the United States Independent Telephone Association, representing more than 10,000 independent telephone systems with representatives present from all sections of the United States, in convention assembled at Chicago, June 26, 1919, That it hereby expresses to A. S. Burleson, Postmaster General of the United States, and his assistants, its appreciation for his fair, just, and impartial administration of the wire systems of the country.

The annual report of the Western Union Telegraph Co. for the fiscal year 1919 states, with reference to the governmental control of its properties:

The policy of the Post Office Department during the year of Government control was constructive and eminently fair to the property.

All the facts and circumstances in connection with the successful handling of these properties have been laid before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and before the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives; and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, in presenting the general deficiency bill, June 2, 1920, stated on the floor of the House with reference to the management of these properties:

Mr. GOOD. * * * And in this connection I think I should say the administration of the wire systems of the United States was a splendid administration of those systems. There was a billion or two of property involved, and the Postmaster General took over these properties and handled them in a manner that I think reflects great credit upon his executive ability, and he turned back the properties, not as we turned back the railroads, but he turned them back with only an increase of about 10 or 11 per cent in rates. But he turned them back in a condition so that those systems can now carry on their work without an additional increase in rates. But he did it, not by yielding to every demand for an increase in wages, whether it was necessary or not, but by following a business policy that ought to have been followed in every department of the Government. The Postmaster General is to be commended in the conduct of this wire system, for he carried on its operation in a manner that was satisfactory, I think, to the public, to the employees in the main, and without cost to the owners of the systems, whose property he held. (P. 8269, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 2, 1920.)

These testimonials to the efficient management of the wire systems of the country during the period of governmental operation of the telephone, telegraph, and marine cable systems gladly acknowledge the rare business and executive ability displayed by the Postmaster General and those associated with him in their operation.

Work of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce During the First and Second Sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ESCH,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me Thursday, June 3, 1920, to extend my remarks, I wish to submit the following statistical data regarding the work of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress:

Up to and including June 5, 1920, there were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House a sum total of 425 measures, as follows:

House bills	340
House resolutions	27
House joint resolutions	21
Senate bills	29
Senate joint resolutions	7
Senate concurrent resolutions	1
	425

Of these, 116 were reported out of committee, 105 have been acted upon by the House, and 103 have become laws; 90 bridge bills have been reported, and 83 of them to date have been approved by the President.

Hearings were held by the committee on 72 bills and resolutions, the printed testimony amounting to over 6,200 pages.

SUMMARY OF THE WORK OF THE COMMITTEE.

Six members of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce are members of the Select Committee on Water Power, which considered and reported out the so-called "water-power bill," a great constructive measure which will make possible a long-needed development of power sites, but under such Government regulation as will adequately protect the interests of the people. (This bill was passed by decisive majorities in both Senate and House and was sent to the President on May 31, 1920.)

RECONSTRUCTION LEGISLATION REPORTED OUT.

(H. R. 10453; approved Feb. 28, 1920.)

(2) Return of the wire and cable systems to their private owners. (S. 120, approved July 9, 1919.)

(3) Improving the facilities and service of the bureau; authorizing the bureau to establish throughout the United States and its outlying possessions such regional officers, not exceeding 14 in number, and such suboffices as may be deemed necessary in the best interests of the work committed to the bureau, thereby greatly facilitating and expediting action on claims of service men, the bureau being able by virtue of the 14 subdivisions to act in conjunction with such subdivisions of the Federal Board for Vocational Education and the Bureau of Public Health, resulting in eliminating red tape and promoting economy; authorizing the Postmaster General to receive war-risk insurance premiums and act for and turn over to the Secretary of the Treasury the money so received; authorizing the Postmaster General to receive and transmit to the bureau applications for converted insurance and applications for reinstatement of lapsed insurance—resulting in great convenience to the soldier and further eliminating red tape; providing for the payment of family allowances under certain conditions—promoting equity to dependents; providing further for the free hospital and medical treatment of honorably discharged commissioned officers and enlisted men; and providing for the stabilization and the making more attractive of Government insurance (converted insurance) and placing the whole plan of Government life insurance upon a sound basis. (H. R. 13558—Wason bill; passed House May 20, 1920.)

Agricultural Cooperation—Collective Bargaining.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS L. RUBEY,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13931) entitled "A bill to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products."

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall give this bill my very hearty support. It has been stated upon the floor of the House by those who are opposing it that it grants special privileges to farmers. I do not believe that the passage of this act will confer upon the farmers any privileges they do not now have. This bill gives them the right to organize for the purpose of marketing their products, and I feel certain that they have that right now. Some one may ask, Why, then, should we enact such a law? I answer that there have been a number of instances where farmers organizing associations of this kind have been prosecuted under the Sherman antitrust law, and while in every instance they have been acquitted, still they do not like to go into these associations as long as there is even a chance that they will be subjected to prosecution. The farm organizations and associations all over the United States have asked for the passage of this measure, so that all doubt may be removed as to their rights to organize and market their products. In other words, that the principle of collective bargaining may be recognized by law.

Produce! Produce! The cry "Produce!" comes from every section of the country. Not since the early days of the war has the appeal been as urgent as it has been for the past few months. Then the farmer was asked to produce to feed the soldiers and help win the war. Now he is asked to produce to feed the citizens of the Republic and help to reduce the high cost of living. The farmer is patriotic. When we were at war he put forth every effort and overcame almost insurmountable difficulties. He produced in greater abundance than ever known before. Now that we are at peace, our Army demobilized, the farmer can be depended upon to do his full duty. He is confronted with difficulties and hardships as never before—scarcity of labor, high cost of seed, machinery, labor, and everything needed in the work of production. Assure the farmer a square deal, a reasonable return for his outlay and his labor, and he will again produce the foodstuff to feed the toiling millions of America.

The House to-day, by the passage of this bill, will take a great, advanced step for the betterment of agriculture. Let us without equivocation confer upon the farmers of America the right to organize and form clubs, associations, and bureaus for the purpose of the preparation, handling, and marketing their crops and live stock without the fear of being arrested for some supposed violation of the antitrust law. For many years they have been contending for this privilege. It is only by this means that the producer can have any say-so whatever in what he gets for his products.

Gentlemen on the floor of this House talk about the great, independent farmer. The facts are he is most dependent, and the occupation he follows is the most precarious and uncertain of any occupation in the country. In the midst of his planting, cultivating, and harvesting he is subjected to all kinds of weather conditions. Sunshine and rain coming in due season are his best friends, and yet if they do not come in the right proportion and at the right time they may become his worst enemies. If the season is favorable and abundant crops reward his earnest toil, he has yet to transport them to market and turn them into cash. Acting single handed and alone, he is wholly at the mercy of the dealer. Acting in cooperation with his neighbors and the fellow members of his club or association, he becomes more independent. Acting together they may select their market, ship in carload lots, cut out unnecessary middlemen, save overhead expenses, and get a better net return.

Not only is it necessary, Mr. Speaker, to produce, but it is equally essential that the foodstuff produced be transmitted from the producer to the consumer as cheaply as possible. Under present conditions it costs far more to distribute than it does to produce. Prices of farm products increase very rapidly after the products leave the farm. Potatoes for which the farmer probably received $1 a bushel are selling in Washington to-day at seven and eight dollars. I am firmly of the opinion that under the provisions of this bill much of this waste will be eliminated, and in so far as that is done the bill will benefit both producer and consumer.

Mr. Speaker, there never was a time in the history of this Republic when the great industry of agriculture needed the encouragement and the help of the Government as it does to-day. That is the reason I made the strenuous fight I did for increased aid to agriculture when we had up in this body the Agricultural appropriation bill. For years the trend of the population has been toward the cities, and never so much so as at this very time. Life in the cities, with its varied attractions and with the short hours of labor and the exceedingly high wages paid, is fast taking the boys from the farm. Not only is it taking the boys but it is taking the men and the women. There are thousands of unoccupied farmhouses and millions of acres of rich, uncultivated lands scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land. How can the trend of this movement be changed from the city toward the country? Fortunate, indeed, will the Nation be if it can only hold those upon the farm who are there to-day. It can not be done by painting word pictures of the beauties and the glories of farm life. It is a case where "money talks." Farming must be made profitable. Congress owes it not only to the farmers themselves but it owes it to the people as a whole, who must depend upon the products of the farm for their food and clothing, to pass such just and equitable laws as will give renewed encouragement to the farmer and as far as possible enable him to meet the conditions which confront him.

Mr. Speaker, illustrating what I mean by Government aid to the farmer, I trust I may be pardoned if I refer briefly to the changed condition and the benefits that have come to the American farmer by the legislation enacted during the last few years.

FARM CREDITS.

Prior to the passage of the Federal reserve act the farmer could not borrow money on real estate from a national bank, and such a thing as credits based upon farm paper was not provided for by law. That act, passed in December, 1913, authorized national banks to loan money on real estate and made farm paper, based on agricultural products, a satisfactory collateral for rediscount, thus extending to the farmers two lines of credit he had never had before.

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT.

For years and years the farmers of America, while offering the best security known among men—old mother earth—were compelled to pay excessive rates of interest, and in addition thereto frequently high commissions. Now, under the Federal farm-loan act passed in 1916 he is enabled to borrow money for a long period of time without paying any commissions and at the very low interest rate of 5½ per cent. Nearly $450,000,000 have been loaned under the provision of this act. But that is not all. The large loan companies, coming in competition with these Government rates, have been compelled to lower their rates and reduce their commissions, so that every farmer in the land who has borrowed money has been benefited by the enactment of this law.

FEDERAL AID TO PUBLIC ROADS.

Far-reaching in effect and of inestimable importance to agriculture was the passage of the act extending Government aid in the building of our public roads. Never before in the history of the country had Congress taken part in nation-wide wagon-road construction. Under the provision of this act and the amendments thereto $275,000,000 have been authorized by Congress, available for the construction of roads in every State in the Union and in every county in every State. The World War, for the time being, put a check upon road building, but since its close the movement has begun again, and to-day in every part of the Republic the Government is cooperating with the State and county, and such an era of road improving is going on as has never before been seen in our history. Within the next few years we shall see this work completed, and the farmers will have good hard roads from their homes to the market places; roads over which they can haul their products in any and all kinds of weather.

PARCEL POST—RURAL ROUTES.

Hand in hand with good roads go rural routes and the Parcel Post System, carrying the mail daily to the door of the farmer and enabling him by means of the Parcel Post System to market his foodstuff and obtain from the near-by city or town the supplies needed by his family and in the conduct of his farm work. It has been my pleasure to have secured the establishment of many rural routes, and I hope the time may not be far distant when every farmer in this land may have a mail box in front of his home, and if that be not possible, then one within convenient distance, so he may get daily mail service.

AGRICULTURAL COOPERATION EXTENSION ACT.

This act, commonly known as the Smith-Lever Act, was passed by Congress in 1914. It has been referred to as the greatest single contribution to agriculture ever conceived by any government. For many years the Department of Agriculture, through its experiment stations and other agencies, has been gathering together vast stores of information valuable and helpful to the farmers. This act provides the method of carrying this information directly to the farmer and showing its value and utility by actual farm demonstration. It is the most practical movement ever attempted, and through county agents gives aid and instruction to the farmer upon every phase of agriculture. The amount of money now available for this extension work from Federal, State, and local sources amounts to about $14,000,000 annually. It gives aid and encouragement not only to the farmer and the farmer's wife but to the young folks as well, with the result that boys and girls' clubs are formed in almost every section of the country.

BUREAU OF MARKETS.

In 1913 Congress took its first great step looking to the marketing of agricultural products. Prior to that time our great Department of Agriculture had devoted its work almost entirely to the aid and encouragement of production. With the creation of the Office of Markets it began its equally important work of aiding in distribution. In 1917 the name was changed to the Bureau of Markets, which more nearly designates the importance of the work that it is doing. To-day this bureau is performing a function for the farmers of America unexcelled by any other department of the Government.

HOG CHOLERA.

In recognition of the importance of the live-stock industry Congress has not failed to come to its aid and assistance. In 1913 the first large appropriation was made for the eradication of hog cholera. At the same time a law was enacted for Government control and the thorough inspection of hog cholera serum. The scientist who discovered and perfected this serum is a Missourian. He received no royalty for his discovery, but his reward comes in the consciousness of the good he has done for the hog raisers of his country. The loss from hog cholera has been reduced from 114 in every 1,000 to 41 in every 1,000, and it is estimated that the annual saving is $40,000,000.

TUBERCULOSIS OF CATTLE.

One of the most destructive diseases among live stock is tuberculosis of cattle. The annual loss from this disease is $50,000,000. Three or four years ago Congress made an appropriation and directed the Department of Agriculture to proceed with the control and eradication of this disease. It will take many years to completely eliminate it, but it can be controlled and greatly reduced. The means of combating this dread disease among cattle and hogs has been found and already marked progress has been made.

THREE MEASURES IN ONE.

Three of the most important measures enacted by Congress were the cotton-futures act, the grain-standards act, and the warehouse act. They were all passed in the Agricultural appropriation bill in the House in 1914. The cotton-futures act is the first successful attempt by the Government to control and regulate dealing in cotton futures by the cotton exchanges, and it is to be regretted that the same sort of control and regulation has not been extended to all exchanges dealing in food products. The grain-standards act provided for the establishment of uniform standards for grain and for Government supervision of the grading of all grain in interstate commerce. The warehouse act authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to license bonded warehouses and provided for standardized warehouse receipts. Under the provisions of this law receipts issued by a licensed warehouseman on staple farm products become as good as money in hand.

NO POLITICS IN AGRICULTURAL LEGISLATION.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the great constructive measures for the benefit of Agriculture passed by Congress since March 4, 1913. There is not a farmer in America who should not be pleased with this wonderful record and commend the Congress for its activity in his behalf. Time and again I have proclaimed upon the floor of this House the fact that there should be no politics in the consideration of measures for the promotion of agriculture. In the formulation of these measures in the Committee on Agriculture, and in their consideration upon the floor of this House, no thought of political advantage or disadvantage has entered the minds of Members, but I believe that all have had in view as their sole object a sincere desire for the betterment of agriculture.

READY TO COMPARE RECORDS IF DESIRED.

However, Mr. Speaker, in these closing days of this Congress I note that some of my friends upon the Republican side of the House have begun to call attention to the things they have accomplished and to boast about them. If they want to compare records with us, we are ready to meet them. Here is the Democratic record as it relates to the one single industry of agriculture. It is that marvelous record of agricultural accomplishments to which I have referred and which I have set forth, and it is a record that has never been equaled, much less excelled, in all the history of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, I rejoice in these great achievements for the promotion of agriculture. I rejoice because it is the greatest industry in the land, affects every man, woman, and child, and deserves every bit of aid that Congress can give to it. I may be pardoned for taking some personal pride in this legislation, because it has all come under my personal observation. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture I have assisted in framing these bills and have advocated them upon the floor of the House.

It has been the practice from time immemorial to say complimentary things about the farmer. Cato, centuries ago, said, "The agricultural population produces the bravest men, the most valiant soldiers, and a class of citizens the least given to evil designs." Washington declared, "Agriculture is the most healthful, most useful, and most noble employment of man." Public men flatter the farmer, and political parties all make promises to him in their platforms. I agree with the good things said about him, but I have been anxious to do something more substantial, and I have endeavored to do that by working for and assisting in the formulation of the legislation which has been passed for his particular benefit.

Federal Land Bank Loans.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAY STONE BRIGGS,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 18, 1920,

On the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 351) extending the provisions of an act amending section 32 of the Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916, to June 30, 1921.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced of the necessity for the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], which provides for the purchase by the United States Treasury of the bonds of the Federal land banks up to March, 1921. The resolution as originally reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency provided that such purchases might be made by the Treasury up to June 30, 1920, but now such committee comes forward with an amendment to its own resolution limiting the purchase to bonds issued against loans approved only up to March 1, 1920.

It is urged that the reason for limiting the purchase of such bonds to loans approved prior to March 1, 1920, is to take care of so-called commitments or approved loans which were made after the land banks were instructed in February to grant no more loans after that month, that the attack on the constitutionality of the tax-exemption features of the bonds of the Federal land banks has had the effect of impairing the market for the sale of such bonds, and that the land banks have no money available with which to advance the loans made and for which in many instances mortgages have already been executed and recorded.

Of course, it is perfectly apparent that the purpose of the attack on the constitutionality of the tax-exemption features of the bonds of the Federal land banks was inspired by those interests which for years past, prior to the organization of the Federal land banks, had controlled the market for loans and had been accustomed to charging the farmers of the land, especially in Texas, 10 per cent for all the money loaned, to which were added large costs for attorneys' fees, abstracts, and commissions, with frequent renewal costs, if fortunate enough to be able to secure a renewal when needed. It was to put a stop to this practice and exploitation of the farmers of this country that Congress provided for the creation and organization of the Federal land banks.

These institutions are really cooperative farmers' organizations, the bonds of which so-called land-banks are given recognition and standing by the Government, and by reason of such have in the past been sold at low rates of interest, generally 4½ per cent, and the money thereby received been advanced to the farmers at a 1 per cent advance, with an additional 1 per cent to care for the amortization or sinking-fund feature of the loan. The effect of the creation and establishment of these Federal land banks had a most astonishing and wonderful influence in reducing the charge for money borrowed by the farmers of this land. In fact, their operation has been so tremendously successful that it has caused consternation in the ranks of the money lenders who were previously accustomed to fatten and grow rich upon the needs and misfortunes of the farmers. These interests have, therefore, done everything possible to discredit and embarrass the successful operation of the Federal land banks, but without any marked success until this attack on the constitutionality of the tax-exemption features of the law was started.

I do not believe that these interests really entertain the hope that such attack will be sustained. In fact, the trial court upheld the law and declared it constitutional. But owing to an appeal being taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court having called for a reargument, which will delay any decision until the latter part of this year, prospective buyers of the bonds of the land banks are inclined to hold off from further purchases until the Supreme Court has finally acted.

It was to take care of this situation that the resolution before us was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, enabling the United States Treasury to purchase such bonds practically for such period as might reasonably be expected to intervene before the United States Supreme Court should hand down a decision in the case pending before it. In this way the land banks could continue to operate and give their invaluable aid to the farmers everywhere who needed and desired to borrow money at low rates of interest and on very long time. This original resolution would enable these land banks to act upon the pending applications for loans, already aggregating between $50,000,000 and $100,000,000. If the proposed amendment of the committee to its own resolution should be adopted, the Federal land banks will simply have to quit business until the United States Supreme Court has acted in the case now before it on appeal. In other words, such banks will have to stop business for probably 10 months or a year, have to discharge a large part of their office force, have to endure to a large extent the loss of their administrative and field organizations, and also have to suffer the injurious effects flowing from the disappointment of farmers to secure loans and from the general demoralization that attends the suspension of the operations of any great business.

Surely this Congress does not want this situation to continue any longer; and I insistently urge the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, which will allow the land banks to continue business.

The Congress of the United States has advanced enormous sums of money to the railroad interests of this country and to other great interests for the continuance of their functions and the service which they have been accustomed to render. I can not conceive that the Republican Party will deny to the farmers of this land what it has granted to the great interests. If the amendment of the committee to its own resolution should be adopted, it can mean, however, nothing more or less than the grossest kind of discrimination against the farmers of the land and in favor of big business.

Surely no American can ever fail to remember with the greatest pride and satisfaction the wonderful example of patriotism and devotion to the interests of their country which the farming classes of the United States gave during the recent World War under the most difficult and trying circumstances that possibly ever faced them. Let us not forget this magnificent record in dealing with this question, and let us remember that these self-reliant, sturdy, honest, liberty-loving, and true Americans are not asking anything more than that the Government shall accept at par and current rates of interest the obligations of the farmers of this land, secured by as fine mortgages as can possibly be obtained, and which obligations, based upon such bonds, will be paid to the very last penny.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the ending of the war has not ended all of the problems connected with it. We might classify our experiences of the past few years into three great divisions: First, our preparation to engage in the war; second, our actual participation in the conflict; and third, the solution of the problems resulting from the aftermath of war.

The Government was, of course, expected to provide men and arms and munitions for the actual conflict, as well as to direct the forces in the field and care for the wounded and disabled on the field of battle. It is true that other agencies were recognized as more or less official and were permitted to participate with the Government because of their previous experience.

For example, the American Red Cross, to which the Government had intrusted the care of the wounded, and the Y. M. C. A., which was authorized to provide entertainment and handle much of the canteen service, naturally entered upon those duties coincident with the Government's own activities. Later other agencies, which were invited or volunteered, responded to the full limit of their resources, and rendered magnificent services, which merited and received the country's grateful appreciation.

But I would say that foremost among such volunteer agencies, acting both as a whole and individually, came the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, with their then half a million patriotic American citizens making up the membership of the order.

This great order seemed to sense with prophetic vision the frightful consequences of war, and proceeded to set in motion and bring to successful fruition or achievement through its Elks War Relief Commission a service most essential and timely which had not been anticipated or performed by any other agency.

As an illustration, the Elks War Relief Commission very early realized that our arms could not be engaged against the enemy without the resultant loss of life and the wounding and disabling of many thousands participating. The Elks were the first to suggest to the Government the building of a reconstruction hospital, and offered to purchase a site and erect a building for the purpose, to be turned over to the Government gratis for use during the period of the war and as much longer as needed, and our Government hastened to accept this generous and timely offer.

The Elks Reconstruction Hospital, at Boston, was thereupon erected, completed, and equipped in record time, and was the only hospital of the kind ready in time to receive and treat the first of the disabled returning soldiers, sailors, and marines of our fighting forces.

Two large base hospitals in France, completely outfitted and equipped by the Order of Elks, were among the most efficient operated during the war.

It is a matter of record that the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks largely financed or assisted in financing the Salvation Army during the period of the war, thus making it possible for that great uplift organization to successfully accomplish results among those in the trenches that have received the unstinted praise of practically every person connected with the American Expeditionary Forces abroad, as well as the mother and father of every boy in the service. It has been publicly stated by Commander Evangeline Booth that but for the assistance of the Elks the Salvation Army could not have accomplished the results that it did at the front. This in itself is a great tribute to any organizaion.

Few things are of greater importance than the rehabilitation of those patriotic American boys who served our country overseas and who have now returned to us physically disabled as a result of wounds received in the most honorable service any citizen can render his country in time of a great national peril.

To have rendered such service in a great international crisis when the safety and civilization of the world were involved is even a greater honor and distinction.

Congress has endeavored to make proper provisions for the rehabilitation of the wounded and disabled heroes through a program for their vocational training and reeducation.

This is a new departure in the functions of Government. It is, however, no longer an experiment, because it has now reached that point in practical operation where it is proven that any physically disabled man can be vocationally trained or reeducated so as to be made independent and self-supporting, and a self-respecting member of society.

Our attitude toward vocational training is shown by the fact that the law providing for it was passed by unanimous vote in both Houses of Congress. But there have developed some obstacles to the successful carrying out of the Government's vocational-training program that could not be foreseen when the law was being enacted.

Here, again, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, through the Elks War Relief Commission, has shown a broadness of vision and a spirit of practical progressiveness that, in my opinion, merits the sincerest appreciation and highest regard of every citizen of this country. Particularly is this true because of the timeliness and the generosity with which the Elks met a very urgent and pressing need and emergency. But this is, in fact, a well-known characteristic of the Order of Elks.

The vocational-training law makes these disabled men eligible for training on their discharge from the hospital, but their training compensation is not payable in advance and few men on leaving the hospital are able to maintain themselves even for the short period while they must await their Government allowance. The Elks War Relief Commission generously and, we might say, providentially met this serious situation by providing a large revolving fund with which to meet the financial needs of these disabled men and permit them to immediately enter upon their training courses.

The practical value of this fund to the Government's vocational-training program is shown by the fact that official Government records show that on June 1, with a total of 37,024 disabled men in training, there had been 28,671 separate instances in which they had been financially assisted by the Elks fund for a total amount of $502,898.05. Officials connected with the Federal Board for Vocational Education have stated that thousands of these boys either could not have entered upon their training in the first instance or could not have continued it except for this assistance received from the Elks. I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion the Elks have not only done much to insure the success of our vocational-training undertaking but have saved the situation in an emergency which might have meant failure but for some such assistance as they have furnished through their broad vision and wide understanding.

Our law makes no provision for caring for those patriotic American boys who enlisted in the armies of the Allies and were wounded in that service. But the Order of Elks is caring for them, and they can receive vocational training at the expense of the Elks, just as those disabled in our own military forces are trained or reeducated at the expense of our Government.

In all these matters undertaken and so successfully carried out by the Elks there have been no public drives or no street canvassing for funds, and no money has been solicited or received by them from any sources outside the individual Elks or the subordinate Elks lodges.

As was stated on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] at the time this generous offer was accepted on behalf of the representatives of the Government:

The Elks fund thus provided is the first instance of the kind in the history of the country where a great patriotic, fraternal organization has come to the aid of the Government in so timely, helpful, and substantial a manner.

And greater than all this giving of money, greater than the erection of the magnificent reconstruction hospital at Boston, or the equipping of the two large base hospitals in France, or the donations and assistance to the Salvation Army, has been the spirit of sympathy and helpfulness reflecting the fraternal fellowship in which the membership of the splendid Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks has by personal contact encouraged so many thousands of our wounded and disabled heroes to successfully carry on in refitting or reeducating themselves for the future.

The patriotic services rendered by the Elks War Relief Commission have been so distinctive, and have so favorably impressed those of us who have had occasion especially to investigate the subject of the vocational training of our disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, that I desire to record the names of the members of it as a slight mark of appreciation. The chairman of the commission is Hon. John K. Tener, a former Member of the House of Representatives and a former governor of Pennsylvania, and the secretary is Mr. Joseph T. Fanning, of Indiana and New York. The other members are Mr. James R. Nicholson, of Massachusetts; Mr. Edward Rightor, of Louisiana; Mr. Fred Harper, of Virginia; Mr. Bruce A. Campbell, of Illinois, all past grand exalted rulers of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; and the present grand exalted ruler, Frank L. Rain, of Nebraska, ex-officio member.

The cooperation of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks in the Government's vocational-training program has attracted wide and favorable attention. I desire to insert in the RECORD the following editorial comment on the subject from the New York Evening Post, one of the oldest and most conservative newspapers in this country:

TRUE FRATERNITY.

The story of how the Order of Elks turned itself into a big brother society for the benefit of the disabled soldiers is one of the most inspiring narratives that have come out of the war. As told before the House Committee on Education by Mr. J. W. Lysons, a representative of the war relief commission organized by the Elks, it shows a combination of sympathy and practical assistance that deserves to stand as a model. Finding itself at the signing of the armistice with unappropriated funds, the commission selected from numerous suggestions for the disposition of this money the plan of aiding in the work of the Board for Vocational Education. The sum of $100,000 was set aside for this purpose, and an additional sum of $200,000 was made available as a revolving fund to be lent to young men in training who were in need of aid. There were many soldiers who were unable to enter training because they did not have money for their first month's expenses. What have been the results? Of the total of 26,000 men in training on March 1, 1920, under the Vocational Board, no fewer than 22,574 have received help from the Elks. The amount loaned to them has reached over $400,000, of which over $200,000 has been repaid.

This is the smaller half of the story. What the Elks really gave was something rarer and more precious than money—human sympathy and persistent personal effort. This was needed in a special manner. Men had to be persuaded to take up vocational training. Some of them had the feeling that the country owed them a living. Some were earning good incomes by selling or even begging on the street. Some were disheartened. In many instances representatives of the Elks went before the board and worked to shorten the delay that hung over it. All these activities required tact and patience as well as the will to help. The Elks have given a notable demonstration of true communal effort.

I also desire to submit for the RECORD a letter from the War Department containing the thanks of the Surgeon General for the splendid war relief work done by the Elks, declared to be "first in that respect," the letter being as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 3, 1919.

Mr. JOSEPH T. FANNING,
Secretary Elks War Relief Commission,
50 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the Surgeon General to acknowledge with thanks your letter of the 31st of October. From it and from the report you so kindly inclosed there will be no difficulty in obtaining a review of the excellent work done by the Elks War Relief Commission during the late conflict. You are to be congratulated upon the unusually fine showing of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. From what I know of the subject I think you stand first in that respect.

With kind regards, I remain,
Sincerely yours,

CASEY A. WOOD,
Colonel, Medical Reserve Corps, U. S.

The National Budget v. Presidential Prerogative.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. ANDREWS,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely regret that the President has deemed it necessary to veto the budget bill (H. R. 9783) recently passed by Congress, and proposing a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts.

The bill provided for far-reaching practical economies in public expenditures. It would have systematized public business and exposed extravagances and duplications whenever and wherever they might appear in the expenditures of the Government. Such reform has been needed for many years, but the war expansion of public business has greatly increased the demand for legislation of that character. The passage of that bill and the recent amendment of the rules of this House prepared the way for intelligent retrenchment in the conduct of public business. The value of an independent audit can not be fully appreciated without an examination of existing conditions and their comparison with the conditions that would obtain under the proposed legislation.

The accounting system of the Government is now under the jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of the Treasury. The six auditors are assigned definite jurisdictions in the examination and settlement of the accounts of the different departments and independent establishments of the Federal Government.

The Comptroller of the Treasury is the appellate officer of the auditing system. He and also his assistant are likewise under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury. These accounting officers are now appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and are subject to removal at the pleasure of the appointing power. It is impossible to prevent the exercise of undue political and executive influence in the examination and settlement of Government accounts. Moreover, it is impossible under the existing system for Congress to utilize the knowledge and skill of the accounting officers in the investigation of expenditures in the various departments and independent establishments of the Government.

Suppose, for instance, the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department should find it necessary to call the auditor for that department as a witness in connection with the wasteful extravagance of the War Department during the recent war. Under the law he not only examines and settles the accounts of the War Department but he is also the legal custodian of all contracts and files of settled accounts arising under the Secretary of War. The keener the challenge as to the integrity of that department or its lack of economy in public expenditures the greater will be the need of his testimony in ascertaining the facts. At the same time, however, the Secretary of War would realize that his testimony should not be allowed to enter the records of the investigation. He could complain of that auditor not only to the Secretary of the Treasury but likewise to the President concerning any testimony that that officer might give to a committee of Congress in such case. Does anyone doubt for a moment the bearing of such conditions upon the mind and actions of that auditor as an accounting officer? Can anyone doubt what action would be taken with respect to the immediate discharge of such an accounting officer if the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President should be opposed to such an investigation? The more serious the nature of the exposure the more urgent would be the Executive demand that that auditor should remain silent. If, on the other hand, however, public interest should demand that he should speak and reveal the knowledge in his own possession and in the files of his office, and if the terms of the bill which the President has vetoed should have been enacted into law, that accounting officer would be emancipated from Executive influence and could respond to Congress itself, and the files of his office would be available to the congressional committee making the investigation. These statements will clearly illustrate the extent to which all officers and clerks in the accounting offices of the Government would be placed in a position of safety and independence, so that any branch of the Government with legal right to the information they possessed could secure it without interference on the part of those who might be personally involved in any disclosures of facts. Notwithstanding these weighty arguments urging an independent accounting, the President has pressed them aside and substituted for them an assumed presidential prerogative.

The provision of the bill to which the President objected reads as follows:

> The comptroller general and the assistant comptroller general shall hold office during good behavior, but may be removed at any time by concurrent resolution of Congress after notice and hearing when, in their judgment, the comptroller general or assistant comptroller general is incapacitated or inefficient, or has been guilty of negligence of duty or malfeasance in office, or of any felony or conduct involving moral turpitude, and for no other cause, and in no other manner except by impeachment.

The President says that he considers this provision unconstitutional, and for that reason he is constrained to return the bill without his signature. His reason is expressed concisely in the words of his message, as follows:

> It has, I think, always been the accepted construction of the Constitution that the power to appoint officers of this kind carries with it, as an incident, the power to remove. I am convinced that the Congress is without constitutional power to limit the appointing power and its incident, the power of removal derived from the Constitution.

Thus, the President declares to Congress and the country that it is far more important to retain an assumed prerogative of the appointing power, and on that basis veto this bill, than it would be to approve it and thus bring to the people of the United States one of the greatest reforms that has ever been proposed in the American Congress. That reform will save many millions of dollars to the people of this country. Nevertheless the President deems it his duty to defeat that reform in order to preserve for himself and his successors in office the prerogative to remove a comptroller general and an assistant comptroller general at the pleasure of the Executive. Does that declaration disclose a wise public policy? Is it in keeping with the financial interests of the American people?

My personal observations and experience in the accounting system of the Federal Government for nearly 18 years compel me to express the deepest regret that the President has regarded an Executive prerogative with respect to these two offices of greater consequence than the economies and savings that the proposed legislation would bring to the people of the Nation.

It has been clearly shown in the debates on the consideration of the bill and on this veto message that the President's position is untenable under the terms of the Constitution. This "incident" to which he refers is subject to limitations by congressional action. I think it has been clearly shown that the provisions carried in the bill would give to the Government an independent audit of public accounts, and that the plan proposed for the appointment and removal of those two officers harmonizes with the Federal Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, this veto message seems to indicate that this great reform can not be adopted and put into effect before the 4th day of next March. If that be true the genuine friends of this reform should stand together firmly in its support until the opportune moment arrives.

Our Democratic friends frequently complain on account of high taxes and large appropriations. So do I. But when we complain we should not overlook the fact that all Federal taxes now collected from the people are exacted under revenue laws written by Democratic Congresses and that the large appropriations are forced upon us to pay contracts made by a Democratic administration. Hence every Democrat who makes such complaints indicts his own party. Then let him forsake the error of his ways and vote the Republican ticket. High taxes can not be avoided until Democratic contracts are paid off.

This budget bill would have been a great assistance in forcing a reduction of expenditures and a consequent reduction of taxes, and the fight for its passage will be renewed by the Republicans next December.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MOSES P. KINKAID,
OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13931) entitled "A bill to authorize the association of producers of agricultural products."

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, we understand the object of this bill is to authorize farmer producers to form associations for the purpose of collectively preparing for market and then marketing their products. It is only farmers who are to be admitted as members of such an association or corporation. Associations of this character formed under State laws are not to be interfered with in any way by this Federal enactment. No intention exists to in any manner control intrastate operations under State laws by the provisions of this bill, and when enacted it will only grant the right to operate in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. Speaker, as I regard it, the purpose of the bill is to provide merely for the protection of the farming industry against the commencement of unwarranted criminal prosecutions against their legitimate endeavors in a collective way. It is intended to safeguard them against the commencement of criminal prosecutions such as have heretofore been instituted against the kind of farmer organizations which the bill contemplates, which prosecutions have failed because no violation of the Federal antitrust acts was shown. However, the decisions so far made have not settled the proper construction of these statutes so definitely as to certainly preclude the commencement of criminal prosecutions in the future on an alleged state of facts differing more or less from what has hitherto been complained of.

It is not that legislation is required to permit an organization of farmers to do something unusual, or morally or legally wrong, that this legislation is sought. In fact, the difficulty is rather with the existing antitrust statutes and the construction which is sought to be placed upon them in opposition to farmer organizations. In the unsuccessful prosecutions heretofore had the antitrust statutes were invoked to prevent farmer organizations from enjoying and exercising the right to hold and dispose of their productions in identically the same way that one natural person may lawfully do. All that is sought by this bill is that several farmers may form themselves into an association, and this artificial legal person or entity be protected in holding and preparing for market and selling the productions of its stockholders, just as an individual farmer may do or as a manufacturing corporation may hold and dispose of its productions in a business way. But the opponents of this measure—and there are a good many of them—talk "equal rights for all and special privileges to none," as if farmers by this measure were asking for special or exceptional statutory privileges not allowed to other associations or corporations. But it is the observance of this very just and laudable rule that farmers here invoke; it is to prevent the violation of this rule of legislation and the rights of citizenship that this legislation is asked by allowing to farmer producers the same rights as are conferred upon industrial corporations. It is a fact that many of the industrial corporations with which the farmer is compelled to deal are severally composed of, say, from 1,000 to 50,000 members. They fix the prices the farmer must pay them for their manufactures, and together these great aggregations of capital, at the same time, arbitrarily fix the prices at which the farmer must sell his products to them. On the other hand, if the farmer seeks to associate himself with his neighbors for the purpose of working together to secure a fair price, they are threatened with criminal prosecutions for alleged violation of the Federal antitrust laws.

Mr. Speaker, a specific object sought by the bill is that farmers be permitted a fair opportunity to realize more nearly the market prices on their productions that ultimate consumers are required to pay, thus for the mutual benefit of the producer and the ultimate consumer. It is a generally recognized fact that in too many instances the middleman realizes a greater share of the price paid him by the ultimate consumer than he himself pays the producer for the product. This is not only extremely unjust to the producer, but at the same time operates injuriously to the consuming public by augmenting the high cost of living in a direct way.

Only a few days ago I received first-hand information that sweet potatoes were being retailed to the ultimate consumer here in Washington at the rate of $7 per bushel for which the farmer producer had been paid but $1 per bushel. Six hundred per cent of unearned increment added to the price paid to the producer manifestly constitutes nothing less than outrageous profiteering. It is apparent that by cooperation under the provisions of this bill these sweet-potato producers might be permitted to realize, say, $2 per bushel and the ultimate consumer required to pay not exceeding $3.50 per bushel, yet allowing a reasonable margin for freight charges and a fair compensation or commission to a middleman, whether the go-between work be performed by a third party or by a representative of the association. While the instance I have mentioned may be an extreme case, and it is to be hoped that but few producers and ultimate consumers are made victims of such a high rate of profiteering, it is more or less typical of the impositions which the farmer producer and the ultimate consumer are made to suffer throughout all the States of the Union. Such practices constitute one of the chief factors in the high cost of living. The experiences are the same in the handling of all farm products, including cattle, hogs, and sheep fed and fattened for the live-stock markets. By organizing under this bill producers of all farm products will only be invoking the first law of nature, the right of self-preservation. The manufacturer sells his products on a cost-plus basis. He charges to the product all labor, material, and every other item of expense, and then he adds a sure profit, and the sum of these constitutes the price at which he sells at wholesale to the dealer, and the dealer adding his compensation for handling and profit added, the ultimate consumer, including the farmer producer, must pay the aggregate of all these amounts as the ultimate price.

On the other hand, each farmer acting singly has found himself obliged to accept the price offered him by the dealers, regardless of the items going to make up the expense it has been to him to place his product on the market. He must sell at that price whether it be at a profit or at an actual loss. Unfortunately, it is too often the case that farmer producers themselves contribute very materially to bringing down the price below what is warranted by the law of supply and demand by oversupplying or flooding the market by too many shipping or selling at the same time. By collective marketing the producers may equalize the distribution and sale of their products, and thus stabilize market prices. Farmer producers in these associations will seek only to secure to themselves the unhampered operation of the natural and just law of supply and demand. It is true that one of the virtues of the operation of the bill is that its effect will be to diminish the opportunities of speculators to baffle the law of supply and demand, to influence lower prices when buying of the producer and higher prices when selling to the consumer. Farmers by being thus associated may at the same time protect themselves against unequal distribution of their products and reduce opportunities for unconscionable manipulation of the market.

The discussions have already disclosed an instance of an association of fruit growers formed in California after the idea of this bill which, during the first year of the organization, realized one-fourth for their share of the prices the productions cost the ultimate consumer. But, keeping up their organization and improving the system, they realized the next year one-half of the price paid by the ultimate consumer, and persevering, further, for a third year the members of the organization realized three-fourths of the price paid by the ultimate consumer. This vindicates the purpose of the bill, which is to render it practicable to bring the farmer producer and the ultimate consumer nearer together for their mutual benefit, that the farmer may realize more and the ultimate consumer pay less for the products. All will grant that any intervening agency or middleman should receive a reasonable compensation or commission, but it is the rankest injustice that the middleman should receive more for having the products merely pass through his hands on their way to the ultimate consumer than is realized by the owner of the farm who produces the same by the sweat of his brow.

Deportation of Anarchistic and Revolutionary Aliens.

SPEECH

OF

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,

OF WASHINGTON.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, December 20, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration (H. R. 11224) a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes," approved October 16, 1918.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this deportation bill adds to section 1 of the deportation clauses of the act of October 16, 1918, enough words to make it sure, in the opinion of your committee, that the letter and spirit of the law of October 16 shall be carried out. The terms of the anarchist deportation act of October, 1918, are enlarged, and it is made plain that membership in organizations which preach anarchy, or revolution by force, or destruction of property, is cause for deportation of aliens. Not only is a membership in such organization made a cause for deportation, but the circulation by aliens of anarchistic or revolutionary or sabotage-teaching literature is made a cause for deportation.

The enlargement of the terms, definitions, and designations of the existing law seems to be necessary for the reason that while the agents of the Department of Justice, as well as agents of the Immigration Bureau of the Department of Labor, have made and are continuing to make arrests of aliens under its provisions, the Secretary of Labor has rendered decisions, which are brought out in reports and instructions from the Department of Labor, rendering such arrests futile. These decisions will be found in the committee's report on this bill, particularly the decision of the Secretary of Labor dated February 28, 1918, and known as the alien I. W. W. decision.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as the decision of the Secretary of Labor is final in matters of deportation, and as the decisions of that department have resulted in failure to deport aliens actively at work for the destruction of this Government, the necessity for the amendment becomes not only apparent but urgent.

Not only is this bill necessary because there are a good many of these alien reds now in the United States, but many thousands are at the ports of the world seeking passage to the United States to do propaganda work for world revolution. Not only do we need this bill, but before present emergency passport laws expire, we must give careful attention to a restrictive immigration measure. We can not hold the doors open to the terrorists of the world who think this the greatest field of all because of our guaranty of free speech and free press.

The number of deportations of alien anarchists and revolutionists since the passage of the Burnett Act has been almost nil. And yet those from foreign lands who are here in the United States gnawing at the very foundation of our Government are increasing in numbers, in audacity, in boldness. Their literature is damnable. Their books and their newspapers openly preach sabotage and boldly urge revolution.

The committee reports this bill firmly convinced that the House, the Senate, and the citizens of the United States generally are through with being told by alien revolutionists, communists, and anarchists, who are within our borders by our courtesy and by our grace, how to run our Government. Free press is ours, not theirs; free speech is ours, not theirs; and they have gone just as far as we can let them go toward running over our most precious rights. [Applause.] They have been here as guests in our house. They have misbehaved most woefully. They are welcome no longer. They must go. [Applause.] And those who come from foreign shores in the future must come only on probation or not at all. [Applause.]

These alien revolutionists themselves are deceived as to what are their rights under the Constitution of the United States. Many polite parlor Bolshevists here in the United States—citizens either by birth or adoption—have a wrong notion also about constitutional rights of aliens, and lend comfort and sympathy, and give advice to revolutionists, which can only serve to get all hands into trouble sooner or later.

Those who apply to deportation cases the doctrine of reasonable doubt or the constitutional rights of accused persons, recognized in criminal courts, are in error. Deportation proceedings are not criminal proceedings and they can be reviewed only by the civil proceeding of habeas corpus. The courts will not reverse or annul the decision of an administrative board or authority under the executive department unless the proceeding was without jurisdiction or clearly in contravention of law. An alien's domiciling himself in this country is merely the exercise of a privilege. He is usually here under the provisions of a treaty giving to the nationals of this country the same rights and privileges as are accorded those of the most favored nation. He has no constitutional right to stay here for which he can claim the protection of a jury trial. All that talk about reasonable doubt is mere subterfuge.

Mr. Chairman, we all have sympathy with those who come from other countries to our shores with good purposes. In the past every opportunity that has been ours has been theirs. Opportunity is still here, the socialists to the contrary notwithstanding. Our present immigration laws work distressing hardships in many details, and your committee is at work on a bill to cure several apparent defects. The committee has divided its work as follows:

First, deportation; second, naturalization and Americanization; third, immigration.

We present the deportation bill. The naturalization bill is on the House Calendar. An immigration bill is being worked out.

A few weeks ago, by direction of a resolution of the House of Representatives, the members of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization were at Ellis Island on a mission of inquiry. My friends, in one day at Ellis Island I experienced almost every emotion that one can know. In one corridor I saw a poor British girl, gaunt, sad, about 35 years of age, clearly a plain working girl, without one sign that might have marked her as a woman of the "submerged tenth," who had come to the United States to live with her sister. On her arm was a baby. The father's name was unknown. The sister's husband had written to say that they would take care of the mother and baby, although they had three or four small children of their own and their income was quite limited. It was held that this British girl and her baby were liable to become public charges, and that wretched woman, who looked ready to jump into the river and become, in the words of Hood—

> One more unfortunate,
> Weary of breath,
> Rashly importunate,
> Gone to her death—

was denied admission and sent back to Britain's shore.

In the next ward was a Jew with his wife and some children coming to this country, all bright, clean, well dressed. On hand to receive them was their son, a resident and citizen, I think, of Boston, and worth several thousand dollars. As so many foreign-born in the United States are doing, he had sent for his relatives. He had sent for the father, the wife, and the mother, and the rest of the children, and there they were. The children and the wife could read, but the poor old father could not read, and that resulted in an inquiry. The law says that if the father is illiterate and past 55 years of age, he may be admitted. The inspector asked the father how old he was, and he, being an honest man, said that he was 50 years old. Down went the gates; "excluded," was the verdict. That showed to me and other members a flaw in the law. It stands to reason that if we are going to admit fathers, a father 50 years of age is more likely to be an asset to the country than one 80 years of age.

We went from there and saw an Italian woman, who was trying to enter the United States. Her brother was there to meet her. She had lived in the United States and her husband took her back to the old country. He died and she married again, and the second husband was killed in the war. She had four children. The brother came from Buffalo to receive her. He brought $800 to show that he was able to take care of her. He said he had an eight-room house in Buffalo, and said that he would take the family and guarantee to care for them. But it could not be. She was declared to be in danger of becoming a public charge and was ordered back. She was in tears and the brother was in tears. Under the law they could not come together even for a kiss or a handshake without special permit from the officer in charge.

Our committee looked into this case, and lo and behold, it developed that the oldest boy, undersized, 16 or 17 years old, had himself been born in the United States, and nothing could deprive him of his citizenship or send him out of the country. On the boy's proud possession—citizenship in the United States of America—it was easy to arrange for the admission of the mother.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we went from these sad sights into a room where they were 85 or 90 noisy, yelling individuals, howling against civilization and particularly the United States. Every one of them was a member of the Russian Workers' Union, a revolutionary organization which starts out its constitution with the words:

> We are atheists, we are anarchists, we are revolutionists.

There they were frothing at the mouth because they were about to be sent out of the United States; they go to-day or to-night, I believe, back to Russia, where they can be anarchists, terrorists, Bolshevists, or whatever they please. Our country was not quite free enough for them and they are mad about it. But Russia is a little too free for them, and they are mad about that. Having defied all law in the United States, they had invoked all of it in an effort to keep from being deported. I wonder why? [Applause.]

In an adjoining room was Alexander Berkman, anarchist and degenerate, bemoaning his sad fate. He is due to depart to-night. He had just come from court where he had put up a plea that deportation to Russia carried with it a possibility of death for him. In court he was defiant. He said:

> The anarchists, Socialists, Bolsheviki, and I. W. W. of the United States are lovers of the country and are merely taking exception to the laws of deportation, which were passed as war measures to be used after the war. I have been an anarchist for 32 years and have served 16 years in prison; but, nevertheless, I expect to die an anarchist.

But his plea in court failed. He cringes. He fears death. Why? Did he not both shoot and stab Frick in an effort to bring death to him? That was 28 years ago, and Berkman was released from prison 14 years ago. He was subject to deportation the day he came out of prison and should have been deported that day. [Applause.]

But for all these years he has gone over the United States teaching and preaching anarchy, craftily leading others to deeds of terror—to the murder of men, women, and children. He organized an anarchist gang in San Francisco that led to the Mooney outrage. He has boasted that he is a terrorist. Now, as he whines and cringes at Ellis Island he is a poor spectacle. The United States offered him everything. It owed him nothing. It owes him nothing now. If he is executed in the country of his birth, to which he goes for this country's good, he can console himself on the scaffold there with the thought that he richly deserved to be hanged here.

Let him go and let his foul, filthy, treasonable books go with him. Back to Russia, Alexander Ossippiwitch!

Emma Goldman, too, was there, ready to start—defiant and mad through and through. She said:

> I am going to fight the Government to the last ditch against deportation. If I am deported, I do not want to go at the expense of the United States, but I am willing to go at my own expense and pick the port at which I shall land.

The Russian Workers flaunted in our faces their literature. They handed out a Russian publication describing the purpose of the communists. Let me read you a little.

> The first group is to proceed, in a direct and revolutionary way, to destroy all forms of authority and central power and of the bases of private and State property.

The second group is to seize by force all means of production, all the land and inventory, to proceed at once to the creation of free productive communes on autonomous federative lines, who are to organize production and consumption from the bottom upward, conforming to the communist principle.

That is the stuff they were handing out at Ellis Island. Now, mark this. It is hard to find the line between those who call for social revolution and those who call for bloody revolution, or between those who call for the stateless communism. A socialist is not an anarchist, but an anarchist usually steps up from socialism. Find the line, my friends, if you can. If you can not find it, have nothing to do with any of them.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Why is it necessary to hunt the line?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Because there are professors in the United States universities, and writers for the newspapers and the magazines, and men even in the Government itself who split hairs about the dividing line.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend does not think that ought to bother us concerning these aliens. If these people do not believe in us, send them back.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, those we saw ready to be shipped out certainly do not believe in the Government of the United States.

I have some of the actual records here. Here is the case of Peter Bianki, as dangerous an anarchist as ever came to the United States. Capt. Swinburne Hall and others speak of him as polite, gentle, well intended, and decry the fact that the United States is deporting him for the good of the United States. I can show you here in the record where he was examined, and questions were put to him trying to soften his answers, trying to get him to say "state socialism," where he said "anarchism," and working him down from damnable anarchy to something soft and sweet that could not be objected to. There are the papers, and I wish I had time to read them. Bianki seemed to have been here two years. He is a member of the Russian Workers' Union. They say that that was a school and an uplift organization. Do not be deceived. It is an anarchist outfit, pure and simple. It was organized in the United States before the cataclysm in Russia. They have been here all of that time. I think they say that there are 7,000 in New York City; there are a few here in the District of Columbia, all digging, digging, digging at the foundations of the Government.

These communists, I. W. W.'s, anarchists, Russian Workers, are all one and the same. Their speakers talk the same language; they use the same halls; they have the same methods; their damnable literature is all alike.

I hardly know where to start to show you some of it, but I will show you this first. Here is the protest of these 86 or 87 Russian Workers to our committee, while we were there, against the treatment they were accorded, because the authorities had put up a bar to keep their friends from handing pistols in to them. This is their protest and their resolution that they would starve.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, nobody objected to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And while our committee was there their attorney came in and officially asked the committee when they could get to their cases, the hearings on which he had been blocking. I told him I thought it would be just about Christmas, and now I call attention to the fact that it is now about Christmas, and I think soon they will be on their way overseas, because they are anarchists. Their platform, their constitution, is so exceedingly revolutionary that no agent of the Government can split hairs about it. But enough of that.

Here is Haywood's "Drop of Blood." You see he has put drops of blood upon it. Here is what he says has happened to the I. W. W.'s. Let me say that everything that has happened to a few of them they have made happen, in violation of law, to other people. They kill, they plant bombs, they set fires, they assassinate; but whenever anyone of their number gets caught they beg and appeal for the protection of the very laws that they themselves have urged to be broken.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Where was that printed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In Chicago, at the printing headquarters of the I. W. W. He names in this a list of martyrs to their cause, some 12 or 14—oh, most terrible martyrs! Hilstrom and others! For every 14 names in there I can name you dozens whom they have killed and assassinated in the United States, from Gov. Steunenberg in 1905 down to Capt. Warren Grim, Dale Hubbard, Arthur McIlfresh, and Ben Casagranda, the four uniformed service men assassinated in cold blood, picked off as they paraded on armistice day at Centralia, in the district which I have the honor to represent in Congress. Those boys were murdered. The I. W. W. puts out a circular alleging self-defense, and trying to make much of the fact that the line of marching soldiers broke and ran from the middle of the street when the rifle fire belched forth from the I. W. W. halls and rendezvous on both sides of the street. What did they want our service men to do, stand there and be picked off by these terroristic murderers? Our soldiers did not stand, but I will tell you what they did do. At the command of the mayor these soldier boys defended the jail and saved 25 or 30 of these "no God, no law, no work" fellows from discovering that not only is there a God but that there is a hell. [Applause.] All but one, who was caught on an outlying road and lynched. Of course, the minute the shots were fired the soldier boys did stampede the hall, but let me repeat that when the mayor of that little city—it is a small town—called on these service men of the United States to go to the jail and defend these I. W. W.'s against the mob, these soldiers, who had seen their own comrades assassinated, defended the assassins and conspirators against the citizens. Oh, that was Americanism for you. [Applause.] I. W. W. martyrs! Drops of blood! It is outrageous, and is intended only to create class warfare, hate, revolution. This bill will make aliens a little chary about distributing that kind of stuff.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I notice that Haywood has named as one of the martyrs Joseph Hilstrom, who was tried and convicted and executed under the laws of Utah for one of the most brutal murders that ever took place in that State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and I do not want anyone here to lose sight of the fact that whenever one of these murderers is arrested and held, under due process of the law, he immediately makes a sympathetic appeal, with the aid of all of these fellows, to the people, and begs for contributions from the working classes. The appeal for money is always made to honest organized labor, and a great many times honest labor has been the goat and has contributed the money. In the State of Washington, in behalf of Mooney, they made this appeal for money and raised about $10,000. Only $1,000 of that went into the Mooney defense, and the $9,000 was used up in care and keep and overhead charges of these revolutionary agitators, such as Haywood.

I call your attention now to this paper, called the One Big Union Monthly, wherein it refers to the American Legion as a revolutionary body! What are they trying to do? Trying to make more class hatred every hour, every minute.

Here is the actual I. W. W. appeal for funds. Union men are asked to contribute. Circulars are sent through the mail by the northwest defense committee—I. W. W., of course—dragging the nickels and the dimes from honest union workingmen to defend these assassins and murderers. Out of the round-up which we made in Centralia, of the 30 or 40 I. W. W.'s in that hall, 16 were aliens, who were preaching and disseminating propaganda to destroy this Government. Those aliens are here only because of our good grace and courtesy of the United States and on sufferance. Some very good people think we can not deport these alien terrorists. Some Government officials think that our present laws do not reach them. This bill will reach them. They are welcome here no longer.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. This morning some of us received a communication which is an appeal from the League for Amnesty to Political Prisoners, located in New York City, and it is in respect to three Russians in New York City, whose convictions were recently sustained by the Supreme Court, in the case of Abrams against The United States, on the 10th of November. We are asked to contribute for the purpose of in some way relieving those three people from the injustice that is supposed and asserted in this communication to have been done them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If I have time, I will show you who is behind these amnesty appeals. I will show you the original letter from the Paterson, N. J., anarchist society starting the movement. Those Ferrer Society fellows at Paterson claim they are philosophical anarchists. Perhaps so, but it is my observation that "philosophical" anarchists are always much interested in the other kinds that make the bombs and do the dirty work. I have here a "political prisoner" appeal from Emma Goldman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that he has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I call the attention of the House to a few more dirty documents. Here is an appeal in revolutionist newspapers, published by aliens, to the negroes of the South, which makes some of the other appeals look like a cent. Here is a telegram dated Washington, D. C., March 26, 1919. It is addressed to the Immigration Service at Ellis Island and says:

Assistant Secretary directs that deportees arriving to-day be not deported. Take from ship. Allow attorneys to see them.

This is signed by Frederick C. Howe, who was immigration commissioner at Ellis Island at that time, but was here in Washington that day. Why he was in Washington talking it over with the Assistant Secretary of Labor and arranging to take off of the ship aliens who under the law were about to be deported—not only take them off, but let them out on their own recognizance—I leave to you to say who was appearing for the United States at that stage of the proceedings. Mind you, these were alien anarchists or revolutionists. And the work goes on. Here is a letter from Emma Goldman. She writes in behalf of a person named Goldberg, who was a procurer.

Mr. BUTLER. Writes to whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. To Frederick C. Howe, the United States commissioner of immigration, and she mentions as friends and men upon whom he could rely the names of Matthew A. Schmidt and David Caplan. She guarantees that they will guarantee Goldberg, the principal, and those two people were among those convicted of blowing up the Los Angeles Times.

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to insert the text of the measure, and any amendments that may be made to it in this or the other body. I call attention that the bill itself covers only the first section of the present anarchist statute. The first section denies admission to the United States of the classes enumerated. The other sections provide for the deportation of all such classes.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I conclude by quoting from the last known letter of Theodore Roosevelt, written in January, 1919, to the American Defense Society:

There can be no divided allegiance here. Any man who says he is an American, but something else also, isn't an American at all. We have room for but one flag, the American flag, and this excludes the red flag, which symbolizes all wars against liberty and civilization, just as much as it excludes any flag of a nation to which we are hostile. We have room for but one language here, and that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans, of American nationality, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding house; and we have room for but one sole loyalty, and that is loyalty to the American people.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I thank you for your attention. [Applause.]

"For the purpose of this section: (1) the giving, loaning or promising of money or any thing of value to be used for the advising, advocacy, or teaching of any doctrine above enumerated shall constitute the advising, advocacy, or teaching of such doctrine; and (2) the giving, loaning, or promising of money or any thing of value to any organization, association, society, or group of the character above described shall constitute affiliation therewith; but nothing in this paragraph shall be taken as an exclusive definition of advising, advocacy, teaching, or affiliation."

Increased Compensation for Postal Employees.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 14338) to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I have the deepest sympathy in the movement to increase the pay of all classes of postal employees, realizing to the fullest extent that they have been underpaid by our Government for years past. Furthermore, I heartily agree with the sentiment voiced that the schedule of pay recommended—a minimum of $1,400 and a maximum of $1,800 to clerks and carriers—is too small to satisfy the needs of these men, a great many of whom have families. I feel, however, that I should vote in support of the bill, H. R. 14338, which is the result of the report of the Joint Postal Wage Commission, in view of the fact that the increases recommended are the largest that can be secured at this time. I sincerely hope that opportunity may be afforded to vote upon additional increases when Congress next convenes, in order that these men may be properly compensated for the important and exacting work that they perform in Government service.

Since I have been in Congress I have consistently favored a just and fair scale of wages for postal workers, and in previous sessions have urged in the committee hearings and on the floor of the House that Congress be liberal in its provisions for those who handle our mails. Every man, woman, and child in the United States is beholden to the mail carrier, for who is there among us who does not feel a slight stir when he notes the approach of the "mailman" to our door with his missives, perhaps of love from dear ones away in a far land or bearing letters of greatest importance in a business or personal way.

Our postal employees are a splendid class of people. They are educated and well trained and we all recognize them to be of our highest type of citizens. It has been repeatedly stated that even under the advanced schedule of pay reported in this bill they will not receive as much as the ordinary day laborer. They have not the right to force their demands, however, like the man who is an artisan and who is a member of a labor organization.

All throughout the period of the war these men performed their very arduous duties, and especially here in Washington we recall how their burdens were multiplied, as they must have been throughout the length and breadth of the land.

During the past winter, which was one of the most severe that New England has ever known, and in which my own district suffered unusual hardship, our postal carriers were obliged to be on the job each day and carry their heavy packs of mail through snow that was many feet deep in a series of blizzards that swept western Massachusetts. Were they allowed to stay at home on days when the snow was deep? No; they must brave the storm and cold and distribute the mail every week day despite the weather.

In the letters that have come to me during the past six weeks on the subject of increases for postal employees I have been impressed with the large number of merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and business men of all lines who have written me urging that just wages be given the postal workers. It is right that these various business interests should show concern in the pay of the clerks and carriers in the Postal Service, for business largely depends upon the efficiency of the mail system of this country. Likewise the newspapers of the country seemed united in their support of added compensation along the line indicated, and scores of editorials were forwarded to me dealing with the subject.

In closing I want to state that I will vote for this bill, not in the sense that it adequately meets the needs of the Postal Service, but because it does give some increase in pay, which is better than the present scale of wages. Were it possible under the rules by which this bill is now considered to offer amendment for additional increases I should be glad to support such a motion, and my hope is that when Congress again convenes I shall be allowed the privilege of voting for a more substantial raise in pay to postal employees, who deserve just and liberal remuneration for the important task that they perform in the life of this country.

Compensation to Postal Employees.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE BLACK,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I am earnestly in favor of an increase of salary to postal employees and I heartily supported the bill which we have just passed for that purpose and think it will do a great deal of good, but there has been some misapprehension as to salaries which are now paid to postal employees and as to the different increases which have been granted to them by Congress from time to time. Therefore, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I insert a letter which was recently written by Postmaster General Burleson to Charles T. Gwynne, secretary Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. This letter gives some interesting information which has been carefully compiled from official records and shows that Congress has not been as neglectful of this worthy class of workers as some uninformed critics have charged.

MAY 27, 1920.

CHARLES T. GWYNNE,
Secretary Chamber of Commerce, State of New York,
65 Liberty Street, New York City.

SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 20, relative to the movement to secure increased compensation for the postal employees throughout the country. In reply permit me to state that I greatly appreciate the opportunity that your request affords me to place before you certain facts in connection with the salaries of postal employees.

Statements have frequently been made that the salaries have not been increased for many years. These statements are made in error, as the Congress has been more than liberal to the Government employees. They are assured of a permanent position and in normal times at a salary higher than that paid for like service in other employment. In hearings held during 1917 and 1918 by a subcommittee of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, House of Representatives, it was shown that the average salaries paid post-office clerks and city letter carriers in the years 1908–1915 were considerably higher than the average paid employees of the United States Steel Corporation.

The Congress provided for reclassification of post-office clerks and city letter carriers effective July 1, 1907, which authorized automatic promotions at the end of each year's efficient service until the maximum grade was reached. These increases in compensation were made without any new legislation. On June 30, 1907, there were 24,577 city letter carriers in the service, and their average salary was $899.91. At the present time there are 35,952 carriers in the service, and their average salary is $1,543.56, an increase of 71.52 per cent. During the current fiscal year promotions authorized by the Congress for city letter carriers, including the increase provided by H. R. 151, amount to $11,059,250.

The number of clerks at first and second class post offices on June 30, 1907, was 26,447, and their average salary $831.94. The number of clerks now employed is 47,751, and their average annual salary has increased to $1,546.86, or an increase of 85.93 per cent. The number of clerks in the grades above $1,200 on June 30, 1907, was 1,407, while to-day there are 31,784; and above the $1,500 grade there are 8,781. While the number of clerks since 1907 has increased less than 100 per cent the number of supervisory officials has increased more than 600 per cent; but these additional places in the supervisory grades have provided many more increases in salary than the number indicates, as an additional place in the $3,000 grade would promote one person in each grade from $1,200 up. The increase in compensation for clerks and supervisory employees at first and second class post offices during the current fiscal year is $10,269,510.

The entrance salary fixed by the reclassification act which went into effect July 1, 1907, was $600, and the maximum salary $1,200. The entrance salary was increased on July 1, 1913, to $800, and on July 1, 1918, to $1,000, and on November 8, 1919, to $1,200, or an increase of 100 per cent. The maximum salary has been increased from $1,200 to $1,650, or an increase of 37½ per cent.

The average salary of railway mail clerks has increasd from $1,161 to $1,796.96, an increase of 54.77 per cent since June 30, 1907.

The average annual salary of all road clerks is $2,051, including travel allowance, or an increase over average annual salaries of all clerks in 1910 of $887, or 76.2 per cent.

The increases provided by the Congress have raised the average salaries of city letter carriers since June 30, 1913, from $1,059.68 to $1,543.56, or 45 per cent; of clerks in first and second class post offices, from $1,064.66 to $1,546.86, or 45 per cent; of rural letter carriers, from $1,062.37 to $1,717.89, or 61 per cent; and of railway mail clerks, from $1,239 to $1,796.96, or 45 per cent.

The following table shows the average annual salaries of various employees in the Postal Service.

	June 30, 1907.	June 30, 1913.	Mar. 12, 1920.
City letter carriers	$899.91	$1,059.68	$1,543.56
Clerks, first and second class offices	831.94	1,064.66	1,546.86
Rural letter carriers	709.42	1,062.37	1,717.89
Railway mail clerks	1,161.00	1,239.00	1,796.96

Shortly after war was declared the Congress enacted legislation which gave employees in the Postal Service, beginning July 1, 1918, an increase of $200 per annum for those receiving $2,200 and less, and a 5 per cent increase for those receiving more than $2,200. This increase amounted to about $40,000,000 in increased compensation annually.

During the present Congress a resolution was passed providing for bonuses involving an additional expenditure of about $35,000,000 annually, so in addition to the regular promotions provided in the appropriation bills the employees are now receiving approximately $75,000,000 annually in increased compensation because of the war.

The clerk or carrier who was receiving $600 on April 1, 1913, has been promoted through automatic promotions and other increases granted by the Congress until now he receives $1,650, or an increase of 175 per cent. The clerk or carrier who was receiving $1,200 on that date is now receiving $1,650, or an increase of 37½ per cent.

The statement that no increases have been provided for employees in the Postal Service for many years is absolutely untrue; but, on the other hand, there has been a steady and gradual increase of the salaries of these employees each year.

The following table shows the average salaries on June 30, 1913, and March 12, 1920, and the percentages of increases:

Postal Service.	June 30, 1913.	Mar. 12, 1920.	Per cent increase.
Post-office inspectors	$1,804.45	$2,151.12	19.21
Clerks, division headquarters, post-office inspectors	1,247.23	1,663.00	33.33
Clerks in post offices	1,064.66	1,546.86	45.31
City delivery carriers	1,059.68	1,543.56	45.68
Railway postal clerks [1]	1,289.00	1,796.96	45.04
Rural carriers	1,062.37	1,717.89	61.70
Postmasters [2]	502.38	684.20	36.20
Assistant postmasters	1,222.80	1,778.00	45.41

[1] In addition to the average annual salary shown above for railway postal clerks, their travel allowance has been increased from an average of $92, on June 30, 1913, to an average of $190, Mar. 12, 1920, or 106.6 per cent.

[2] The low average salary of postmasters is explained by the fact that the salaries of all postmasters (including those of offices of the third and fourth classes, where the salaries are quite low in a number of instances) are included in the computations.

The Postmaster General has stated in his annual reports and before committees in Congress that he believed the Government should be a model employer, that it should pay salaries from 15 to 30 per cent greater than that paid by private concerns for work of similar nature or responsibility, and that when the salaries were not such he himself would willingly recommend to the Congress an increase. Of course, the salaries paid in the Postal Service are those fixed by the Congress, and they can in no wise be increased by the department without legislative action. Realizing the abnormal conditions which existed in certain centers because of the peculiar local industrial conditions, and that the salaries paid postal employees in these localities were not sufficient, the Postmaster General last July took the initiative in the necessary steps to enable him to increase the compensation where the conditions warranted an increase. A resolution (H. Res. 151) introduced by Representative MADDEN on July 19, 1919, provided that the Postmaster General may increase the salaries then authorized by law not to exceed 35 per cent where unusual and abnormal conditions prevailed. The passage of this resolution was urged by the Postmaster General, but it was opposed by certain representatives of the postal employees, who, instead of the provisions of this resolution being granted, urged and insisted that a horizontal increase be made. The department in seeking this legislation was asking permission to follow the same methods that would be adopted by any business corporation doing a national business, as no such corporation would think of paying the same wages throughout the United States.

It is impossible to bring the salaries of the employees at the smaller towns, or where industrial and unusual conditions do not prevail, up to the level of those where such conditions exist without spending unnecessarily hundreds of millions of dollars. The recommendation of the department was not followed, but instead a horizontal increase was made in the salaries, which made many increases where they were not justified, and, on the other hand, made increases insufficient to provide for the cities where abnormal and unusual conditions prevailed. The Congress did what it believed evidently to be for the best interest of the service, and this letter is not intended in any wise to reflect upon its action; but the department is still of the opinion that had the recommendations of the Postmaster General been followed the salaries could have been readjusted at much less cost and in a much more satisfactory manner. The department is still of the opinion that instead of a further horizontal increase in all instances the Postmaster General should be given authority to exceed the present compensation now paid where the circumstances justify so doing, not to exceed 25 per cent.

Many statements have been made that the employees are leaving the service in "droves" and that the service is threatened with a "breakdown" or "collapse." These statements are not based on facts. The resignations in the entire Postal Service of the country during the year ended June 30, 1919, were 11 per cent for clerks and 5.7 per cent for city letter carriers. In the New York City post office there were employed 6,618 clerks, of which 760, or 11.48 per cent, resigned. There are employed 2,769 letter carriers, of which 103, of 3.72 per cent, resigned. During the current fiscal year, up to the present time, there were employed 7,221 clerks, of which number 1,080, or 14.96 per cent, resigned, and of the 2,829 letter carriers employed 121, or 4.28 per cent, resigned. Of the number of clerks resigning practically 50 per cent have been in the service less than one year and are therefore inexperienced and not efficient clerks. A table giving this information in detail by grades is attached. This shows that the turnover in the Postal Service in New York City represents on an average about 12 per cent annually, making the average term of employment more than eight years. For carriers the average turnover is less than 4 per cent, making the average term of employment 25 years.

I feel that this turnover is far less than that represented by any corporation or utility, be it public or private. More than 80 per cent of the clerks and 90 per cent of the carriers in the Postal Service to-day have been employed for more than two years. The same people, therefore, are distributing and delivering the mail that were doing so more than two years ago; and the department has allowed the postmasters all the additional help neded; so if the service being rendered the public to-day is inefficient, only one conclusion can be reached, and that is that the employees are not rendering as efficient service as they were two years ago; if not, the conclusion that must necessarily be forced upon us is that they are deliberately failing to do so. Personally, the Postmaster General does not believe this to be so, as he believes that there is not a more faithful or patriotic set of men employed by either a public or private corporation than the postal employees.

Little consideration seems to be given by some to the fact that the Postal Service is the only service that has declared no embargoes and has accepted for transportation at any and all times merchandise regardless of quantity and handled it with promptness and dispatch not equaled by any other transportation agency, and that the disturbances by railroad and express strikes have thrown into the Postal Service an unprecedented volume of mail.

Statements have been made in publications from time to time that an unprecedented number of men are leaving the service and that these are experienced men, but our investigations disclose that such is not the case. In the city of New York more than 4,000,000 outgoing letters are mailed daily, and a like number are received. As it is necessary to handle each of these letters four times, you can see it makes necessary more than 32,000,000 handlings of letters daily; and this is done with less than one error in each 10,000 leters handled, which is a record for efficiency of which the Postal Service may justly feel proud.

A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

Postal Employees' Salaries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHRISTOPHER D. SULLIVAN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, in voting for this bill I do so with but one regret, and that is that the commission did not see fit to recommend greater increases for postal employees than are carried in this bill. But since it is the best we can get at this time, I shall cast my vote in support of the bill with genuine pleasure, feeling that to some extent the increase in salaries which it does carry will help to relieve these employees in meeting the very heavy expense under which they are now laboring because of the increased cost of living.

To my mind there are no class of people in the Government service more deserving of substantial recognition than are the employees of the Postal Service. It is very much to be regretted that men who have been in the Postal Service for many years have found it obligatory to separate themselves from it because of the fact that they were not able to support their families upon the very small compensation which they received from the United States Government. By these separations of men who were highly skilled and trained in postal work the country—more especially in the large cities—has suffered a very serious setback until at the present time the service is so demoralized that it is meriting severe criticism. Millions of dollars in profits from the Postal Service are annually turned back into the Treasury, while tried and true employees are leaving the service because of inadequate remuneration. I do not believe that it was ever intended, nor do the American people expect, that the Postal Service shall be run as a profit-making source of governmental revenue, and I feel quite sure that every American citizen would much prefer to see less profits turned in and better wages paid to the faithful body of postal employees who serve them day in and day out throughout the year.

Nowhere in the Government service do we find a more faithful and efficient set of employees than in the Postal Service. Our very existence as a Nation is dependent upon the efficient performance of duty by these postal employees, for without an efficient and sufficient mail service our economic progress must fall. And yet these men upon whom we are so utterly dependent for progress and advancement are paid far less than the ordinary truck driver or window washer.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry indeed that this bill does not carry with it a minimum salary of $2,000 per annum for experienced clerks and carriers. However, small as the promotions as carried in this bill are, it is a step in the right direction, and it may be that the next Congress will carry on the good work until finally these faithful servants of the country are given remuneration commensurate with the dignity and character of the important service which they render. When this is done we will have a better Postal Service, for then we will have a body of postal employees who will experience a feeling of contentment and be better able because of it to give the kind of service which the American people believe they are entitled to have in the handling of their mails.

The Republican Party's Hypocrisy on Irish Freedom Unmasked.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. RAINEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, on the 26th day of last January, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date bears witness, I stated, on the floor of this House, that the Republican leaders of this House were not sincere in their pretense of favoring the original Mason resolution; that the Republican Party controlled this House; that the Republican Party, through its majority on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, could report out the original Mason resolution; that the Republican Members on the Committee on Foreign Affairs would never report out the original Mason resolution, which appropriated $14,000 for sending American diplomatic and consular agents to Ireland; that the Republican leaders in this House would not allow the original Mason resolution or any other resolution on Irish freedom that was worth the paper on which it was written to pass this House. And, Mr. Speaker, in these closing hours of this last day of this session I here and now challenge the Republican leaders to live up to their alleged pretenses of devotion to Irish freedom, or to plead guilty to the charge of "playing politics" throughout this session on the Irish question, and, in the end, doing nothing tangible for Irish freedom.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party, through the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, held lengthy hearings on this question months ago. A former Member of this House, Hon. Bourke Cockran, together with Judge Cohalan and many others interested in the Irish question, came to Washington. They represented the sentiments of millions of American citizens; they gave their time to present the reasons why the original Mason resolution should become a law; and what has the Republican Party done? Has the Republican Party passed the original Mason resolution? Has the Republican Party even reported the original Mason resolution out of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House? You know, Mr. Speaker, that the original Mason resolution is dead and lies buried in the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, where the Republican leaders last January decided it was to die, stillborn.

Hon. Bourke Cockran and Judge Cohalan and the people they represent deserve the dignified treatment due American citizens, and how have you Republicans treated them? They asked for the bread of congressional recognition of Irish freedom through the adoption of the original Mason resolution and you have handed them a stone. And that is the Republican record after 15 long months, since you came into power, for you had the votes and plenty of time, if you Republicans really wanted to help the cause of Irish freedom. The Republican leaders knew full well that if the original Mason resolution or any other resolution on Irish freedom was allowed to come to a vote in this House there were enough Democratic votes on this side of the House to pass any resolution on the Irish question that came to a vote at this session of Congress. Let the Republican leaders answer to the American people. Let them in answering remember that promise is not performance. Let them know now, for the Republican leaders have not seemed to realize it to date, that the millions of American citizens who have devotedly wished and expected this House to pass a resolution helpful to Irish freedom are not to be treated the way some parents answer the pleas of their children—by listening to them, patting them on the back, sending them away with smiles and promises, and never doing anything to carry out those promises.

Finally, let the Republican leaders and the Republican Members of this House and Senate never forget that "You can fool some of the people all of the time, all of the people some of the time, but you can not fool all of the people all of the time," as you Republicans will realize when the millions of American citizens who petitioned you to pass a resolution on Irish freedom cast their ballots next November and thereby decree that your successors in the Sixty-seventh Congress shall be composed of a majority who will have the ears to hear, hearts to sympathize with, and the stamina and backbone to vote for and pass a resolution which will hearten and encourage patriotic Irish people who are now struggling against the thralldom of the same alien nation whose yoke your own Revolutionary heroes threw off in 1776.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. WILSON,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 14038) to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and adjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, the bill now under consideration, which embodies and proposes to enact into law the findings of the joint committee that has had under investigation and consideration for more than a year the reclassification of salaries in the Post Office Department, is, in so far as it provides for increased salaries to employees in this department, a great disappointment to many of those Members of Congress who are interested in the welfare of the postal employees of the country and desire that they receive an adequate return for services well and faithfully rendered.

The prompt, efficient, and honest handling of the mail lies very close to the happiness, well-being, and prosperity of the whole people of the United States, and all citizens who have the well-being of their country at heart are vitally interested in having the postal employees paid a wage that will be commensurate with the mental and physical requirements and the character of the services rendered and that will tend to increase the efficiency of the Post Office Department.

Without carping at or criticizing the joint committee that has had an arduous task in working out this reclassification so as to work equity among the postal employees, and recognizing the magnitude of the undertaking and also recognizing the many good features in this bill as a whole, it can not, however, be denied that the Government has been dilatory in granting increased pay to its postal employees, and that the increases provided in this bill are not commensurate with the character of the services rendered and with the increase in the cost of living since 1914.

These employees and postmasters performed a great and patriotic service to their country in sticking to their underpaid positions and keeping the Postal Service functioning during the war. These men resisted the lure of the higher wage that they could have obtained in munition factories, industrial plants, and private enterprises, feeling that it was their patriotic duty as citizens so to do, and believing that the Government would right the injustice as soon as the stress of war was over. That faithful, uncomplaining, and patriotic service in time of the country's great stress makes the meagerness of the increase in this bill all the more apparent and will tend to make these employees feel that the great service rendered by them is not appreciated by the country.

But, Mr. Speaker, they can disabuse their minds of the latter conclusion, for I believe that a majority of the Members of this House are prepared to-day to vote a much larger increase than is in this bill if they had the opportunity so to do, but these Members of Congress are tied by a rule jammed through by the majority steering committee, a rule which permits only limited debate on this great measure that involves the happiness and well-being of thousands of our best citizens who are in the Postal Service and the efficiency and perpetuity of our greatest Government agency, and which rule prohibits any amendment or changes in the bill.

The committee, under this rule, in effect says to Congress, "Here is our bill; if it suits you vote for it; if it does not suit you vote against it; and if a majority of you vote against this bill the postal employees will get no increase at all." This bill comes on the floor of the House after both Houses have determined to adjourn from June 5 until the first Monday of December, and under those circumstances the Members of Congress who favored larger increases all along the line determined that under all the circumstances it was better to vote for this bill and permit the postal employees to get the increases provided than to vote against it and have the old salary continued at least until next January, the earliest date on which another bill could be enacted.

This bill does not, in my opinion, under existing conditions, provide a living wage for post-office clerks, city and rural carriers. The civilized world to-day recognizes it as the inherent right of labor to have a living wage. The old theory that labor was a commodity and could be bought on the market, as other commodities were bought and sold, has been condemned by the civilized people of the world. These are employees of the Government, and the Government under the Clayton law expressed the opinion of the Nation in that statute, which says "labor is not a commodity or article of commerce." The War Labor Board, in its agreement duly sanctioned by the President's proclamation, declared as follows:

1. The right of all workers, including common labor, to a living wage is hereby declared.
2. In fixing wages minimum rates of pay shall be established which will insure the subsistence of the worker and his family in health and reasonable comfort.

It must follow from this that the Nation, having declared this as its policy in relation to all labor, is bound to carry out its declared policy in dealing with its own employees, and Congress on reassembling ought, as its first duty, to revise and amend this bill so as to provide to each employee of the Postal Service a living American wage.

But, Mr. Speaker, what constitutes a living wage is, of course, an open question, but it can not be denied that it ought to be such a wage as will permit the industrious and conscientious worker to maintain his family and himself under reasonably healthful and comfortable standards; to house, feed, and clothe and care for his family and himself; to provide insurance against sickness and death; to provide for his old age; and allow a reasonable sum for educational, recreational, and religious purposes.

The best scientific estimates at hand, based on honest, careful, and wide investigation, demonstrate that the scale of wages in this bill is below the estimated amounts required to maintain a family of five under American conditions.

The age-old ideas of the relations of employer and employee; of labor and capital; and the relative places on the scales of justice, of human rights as distinguished from the rights of property, are slowly being transformed into a newer idea, which recognizes that while property has rights—rights that must be secured and protected—purely human rights must be given the preference over property rights. The thought of the world has moved slowly in the development of this idea of purely human rights, but while its movement has been slow, its trend in the last decade has been ever forward and sure. The statutes of the several States and of the Nation, crystallizing this new idea into the law of the land, giving toil a new legal status and making for social justice, all reflect the new conscience of the American people.

The nations of the world give expression to this new concept of labor in that section of the covenant of the League of Nations which says:

The high contracting parties, recognizing that the well-being, physical, moral, and intellectual, of industrial wage earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in section 1 and associated with that of the League of Nations.

They recognize that differences of climate, habits, and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition make strict uniformity in the conditions of labor difficult of immediate attainment. But holding as they do that labor should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labor conditions which all industrial communities should endeavor to apply so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the high contracting parties to be of special and urgent importance:

First. The guiding principle above enunciated, that labor should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

Second. The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Third. The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life, as this is understood in their time and country.

Fourth. The adoption of an 8-hour day or a 48-hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth. The adoption of a weekly rest of at least 24 hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Sixth. The abolition of child labor and the imposition of such limitations on the labor of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Seventh. The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Eighth. The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labor should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Ninth. Each State should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to insure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the high contracting parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the League of Nations, and that if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the league, and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benefits upon the wage earners of the world.

We are moving forward and progressing each day to better things. Out of all the clamor, agitation, and apparent misunderstanding between capital and labor, employer and employee, will come mutual understanding and agreement as to the rights of each under the new social order, and the day is surely coming when an adequate wage will be willingly paid by the employer, and in return therefor the employee will cheerfully render adequate service, all as a matter of right and justice to employer and employee.

This new idea has not evolved of itself, but is the result of years of persistent, intelligent, and organized effort on the part of the toiler and wage earner, who aspires to higher and better things for himself and his family. His efforts to obtain his desires may ofttimes have been misdirected and the means employed open to censure, but I do not share the fears of many honest citizens that the aspirations of labor and the unrest resultant therefrom portend the downfall of this Nation and organized government throughout the world.

The appellation "radical," now applied so indiscriminately as a term of disapprobation to all who aspire to change the old order for a newer and juster one, representing more nearly the common aspiration of mankind, raises no fear in the thoughtful student of history and observer of the times, for he knows that all of the great human rights and liberties that are ours to-day were obtained only by great effort and agitation, and that the men who led in those great movements were the "radicals" of their day.

The honest wage earner, who is ready and willing to render efficient service for adequate pay, is to-day as always the very bone and sinew of the body of our Nation, and who than he has more interest in the security of property and the preservation of civil liberty, and who more than he could be expected to show greater devotion and fealty to the Government that secured to him "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"?

That nation of free peoples is safe when the wealth-producing heads of families aspire to higher and better things in life for their children than were vouchsafed to themselves. When such hopes and aspirations cease to exist in the great body of wealth producers the nation will decay.

The so-called unrest of to-day is the accompaniment of the transition from the old order to the new, and the adjustments of the new order of social and economic justice to present-day conditions. I am confident that this readjustment will be gradually and peacefully made, and with it will come a happier, stronger, and better free people, more firmly founded on the bedrock of the Constitution that guarantees justice, civil and religious liberty, and the security of private property, and with a greater love and veneration for our free institutions founded on that Constitution.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROLLIN B. SANFORD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, Representative ISAAC SIEGEL, of New York, has delivered a series of addresses throughout the country on "What ails America." His activities in behalf of real Americanization work are well known, and has received favorable commendation from those who are interested in having both native and foreign born to be real Americans. Speaking at New Haven, Conn., lately, Congressman SIEGEL said, in part:

"When war was declared on April 6, 1917, by this country, with its 110,000,000 of people and with its resources over $350,000,000,000, there was but one purpose in the minds of all. That was to win the war as quickly as possible.

"Within a few months, however, manufacturers and employees realized potentially of their power and each one immediately endeavored to obtain a larger amount of money for what he was giving to the Government.

"Extravagance ran riot. We spent approximately thirty billions in the war. True we loaned one quarter of it to the Allies and it may be paid back some time in the future.

NOT READY FOR PEACE.

"Peace found this country unprepared for it. We were not ready for war and were not ready for peace.

"On November last we reached the highest peak in the amount of money which had been issued by the reserve board. Gradually the peak went down. Suddenly within the past two weeks it has climbed even higher than on November last.

"Currency is like a rubber band. You can stretch and stretch it, but the purchasing value of a dollar bill becomes smaller.

"At the present time the greatest stretching point has been reached and with it has come the noticeable fact that as the wages have increased the cost of living has been added thereto. Following the higher cost of living the consumer has found that he has had to pay more and more.

SHOE MANUFACTURERS' PROFIT.

"No sensible American will deny that the workingmen deserve higher paid wages for efficient and thorough work. No sensible American will deny to the manufacturer, jobber, wholesaler, or retailer a fair, reasonable profit, but when the Central Leather Co. of America shows an increase of over $2,000,000 for the three months during 1919 greater than the same period of time in 1918, and when its stock shows a dividend of $9.25, compared with $3.85 for the same period of last year, no person can tell the consumer that shoes will be purchased at a more reasonable price at present as long as leather dealers show this extraordinary gain in profit.

MUST STOP FOR RELIEF.

"We can only obtain relief by starting with the manufacturer down to the employee and consumer. Each must make up his mind to make a lesser profit upon each article than he has been making during the war period. Workingmen must conclude that while engaged in work he must produce to the utmost. The consumer must make up his mind to purchase at the lowest price that which can give the greatest use and at the place where he can pay the cheapest price.

"You have heard that in the city of Lawrence, Mass., during the past six months, more silk shirts have been sold there than in 20 years before.

"Omaha, Nebr., is a city consisting mainly of native born. Its citizens have been reaping a harvest with superabundance of money, and the younger element have been wasting money and run amuck. The result is the city has been topsy-turvy—a man charged with crime thrown into the fire and the mayor of the city nearly lynched.

"In Chicago a similar condition occurred.

BOSTON POLICE WERE MONEY MAD.

"In Boston, a city full of historic and patriotic memories, known all over the world for its high education, the police department declines to perform its duty and forget of their sworn obligation to stand by the Constitution of the United States and by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Series of riots, robberies, and thefts the like of which no city has ever known took place. These policemen were willing to give up every consideration of their fellow men because they had become money mad. The Washington policemen realized that they must not be placed in the same position and they quickly responded to the public opinion throughout the country.

"I can point out to you everywhere the same spirit of unrest and the same desire to accumulate wealth. Goldsmith very ably says, 'Ill fares the land where wealth accumulates and men decay.'

"We, of course, realize that the soldier boys have done their share on the other side. We realize that they gave up their lives in France or were incapacitated; we realize that they have done their share by America; and we realize that they performed an immense piece of work. However, back in some parts of the country many men and women do not realize what America is, and they do not seem to understand what America represents and what its institutions represent. Here in America, Americans born two and three and four generations back, do not know what this country typifies. It does not typify the mere making of money. Citizenship implies more than that. Citizenship implies desire and will and obligation to give all that you possess in behalf of the country in which you live. It typifies the love of good character, and it typifies another thing, love of country, the same as a man who loves his own parents.

"It does not mean jealousy or avariciousness. It means a desire to serve. While the whole country is discussing Col. Roosevelt at the present time, perhaps a few words of his might answer very much if we get the country thinking, 'Fear God and no man.'

"Let me say to you to-night, as far as the immigration committee is concerned, it is determined upon one thing—that in the United States there is not going to be room for a living creature, no matter how small he can be, if he is not willing to stand by America 24 hours a day. There has been too much talk about taking things easily and calmly. We have taken things easily for a long time.

"It is only during the past two years that the immigration bill really provides for illiteracy test and examination both physically and mentally. It gave the Government all the power which it could ask for, in order to effect the deportation of undesirables. I will say to you also that in our investigation the astonishing feature has been that we find that the man who can not read English or any language, in fact, is the very man who is ready to listen to people who have no love for America. Take the steel strike at the present time. Sixty per cent of them can not read or write the English language. They remain slaves naturally to the will of their more educated brethren.

"Prohibition is one of the other important questions before us to-day. Whether we agree with prohibition or disagree with it, the time has come, and it is here now, that the American people have made up their minds that if they are fit to elect Members of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate they are fit to ratify amendments to the United States Constitution by a direct vote and not through State legislatures or legislators who get frightened very quickly at the clamor that is made to them by means of certain propagandists.

PUT EX-PRESIDENTS IN SENATE.

"Some people say, 'What shall we do with our ex-Presidents?' I have offered a suggestion that since every ex-President has a vast experience in governmental affairs, I know of no place where he could do the most good than in the Senate of the United States. If we put a justice of the Supreme Court upon the bench for life, I think the ideal way of utilizing the wonderful service which an ex-President can render would be to put him in the Senate of the United States for life.

"Just think what a wonderful balance of these ex-Presidents were they: Cleveland, or Taft, or Roosevelt, or they will be Wilson, after their terms shall have been served and they will have spoken in the Senate of the United States. So would be the case if we had a Taft in the Senate of the United States to-day—and we must have counterbalance to-day in the Senate for this reason.

"In addition to this, I would make every member of the Cabinet an ex-officio Member of the House of Representatives. I would have him come and explain everything that he is doing.

SAYS TRYING TIME IS COMING.

"So, therefore, my friends, I must reiterate that we are bound to go through very trying times in the next year or two. There can not be any dividing line. Either you are with America or you are against it. We have got to wipe out lynchings here in this country. There can not be one law for the whites and another for the blacks. There can be only one law in America, and that is respect for law; to this country we must stand shoulder to shoulder; to go forward determined, whether we be Jew or Gentile, to make it grander and more beautiful, because it is the greatest country on the face of the earth, and will continue in the future as in the past as the land of liberty by the great Power which governs nations and governs men."

Tribute to Mr. Howard E. Butz.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker——

A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold.

So said Solomon.

Howard E. Butz nourished and cherished the good name he inherited; thus he possessed all there is of worldly wealth worth while, and of this rare type of manhood, in our humble way, we shall strive to translate our impressions gathered from a close personal contact at intervals and at times from the distant point of vantage, which was uninterrupted for a period of nearly 40 years.

Our earliest acquaintance found us witnessing his marriage at the mansion home of his young bride in the heart of the broad and picturesque Buffalo Valley. The honeymoon then entered upon continued in beautiful domestic harmony and mutual helpfulness from the altar to the grave.

Vaughan said:

To God, thy country, and thy friend be true; then thou'l't ne'er be false to anyone.

Howard Butz was all that is admonished in this quotation, and more. He believed that God rules in the affairs of men; he was possessed of passionate patriotism, and not only stood true to his friends, but went unselfishly with them through storm and trial and fire.

We had a full and fair glimpse into his very inner self, and know that he knew the eternal truths and died without regret or fear. He knew his life had been one of service, nor did we wait until our farewell by his grave side to express appreciation of his noble work, which will endure as his best and everlasting monument.

Stepping out into the great world of swift competition, he chose journalism as his profession. In that he matched the success of our greatest editors and, as a writer on political and economic subjects, was clearly the leader of the profession in central Pennsylvania. His habits of mind were of profound thought, and he wrote with skillful analysis and a vision that was clear, while his conclusions were based on unanswerable logic. When time and occasion required, Mr. Butz wrote with great power and faultless diction, and for many years was the peer of the most forceful editorial writers in the State, many of his productions in the heat of campaigns being reproduced in the metropolitan press. In fact, his editorial work was so highly regarded that more than once the opportunity was offered him to become attached to potential city dailies. As an editor he was of the Benjamin Franklin type, combining with his editorship counselor, philosopher, publicist, and political leader. He was possessed of rare intuition, sagacity, and oversight and accuracy of vision as a constant participant in the ebb and flow and whirl of American politics. He can not be measured by the standards which apply to the average country editor, capable as many of them are.

His was a place fixed by the breadth of his achievements extending far beyond the newspaper drudgery encompassed by local environment and opportunity. We might mention the names of many who found place, power, and high estate through his dexterous handling of political initiative. With no overmastering personal and political ambition, he applied his rare talents to aiding others, and for more than a quarter of a century was conspicuous for his helpfulness of many men on their way to preferment. He just naturally led, and usually to victory. Never carried away nor controlled by sudden impulses, his judgment was invariably balanced and accurate. Of fixed principles, he never wavered, never faltered in the face of the fiercest combat. And what he believed and taught he lived to see vindicated by results. Howard Butz was unassuming and knew nothing of ostentation, but on the contrary was amused by it when seen in others, for he knew the world and its foibles as he understood the true philosophy of life and what constitute the substantial and enduring, and the eternal. Nothing on earth ever overawed him, although for the rights of others he held the profoundest respect and was always ready to defend them.

Howard Butz knew and walked with men of humble vocation, and with men financially great, politically powerful, and intellectually master minds. All men looked alike to him just so they were true men. Like Lincoln, he did not care whether men were of high or low estate, but what he wanted to know was, Are they right or wrong?

Of unblemished purity of private life, he possessed rare moral qualities, and in the first and last analysis these qualities rule the world. They must stand against and survive the wear and tear of life's daily conflict. With these powerful forces for the making of a life for great good was combined superior character, and men of character are the world's motive power. A lover of life and nature and his fellow men, he attracted all hearts by the goodness and fullness of his own. Qualities of mind and heart are not easy of description, but we know of the acts of kindness and love, of his tender impulses, of the generous things said and done.

The life work of Mr. Butz was performed amidst exceptional environment and where a true estimate was sure to be made of his qualities, for in Huntingdon and Huntingdon County there is unusual moral refinement, and in this balance one must be weighed, and in a residence of nearly 40 years the general judgment rendered could not be otherwise than unerring. In Huntingdon there has long existed a social fellowship rare in its example of genuine fraternity and free from the narrow prejudices of provincialism. We saw a community of superior manhood and womanhood bowed in grief, and sincere was the lamentation over the loss of their loved friend and citizen. Tributes of rare beauty and touching sentiment have been contributed by neighbors, and this could have come only from the promptings of genuine, ardent admiration and profound respect.

Our effort is to say something of Mr. Butz as we knew him and regarded him, and which may be of value to those who remain. Emerson said, "To help the young soul, to add energy, inspire hope, and blow the coals into a useful flame," is service for man to do. Another writer says that what a man writes to others furnishes a better mirror of his own life than can be reflected or portrayed by a biographer. Hence a letter written our youthful son several years ago by Mr. Butz will furnish an example of his thoughtfulness, his interest, and sound advice, as well as his philosophy and humor. Note the clearness of expression that the boy might understand, and his patience, and the evident fervency and sincerity he projected into the letter which unfolds much of the character of the writer:

[Established 1843. The Huntingdon Globe. Howard E. Butz, editor-proprietor, Huntingdon, Pa.]

DEAR BROWN: A week or two before announcement was made in the Saturday News that you had entered upon the career of a journalist, your father gave me that information by letter. I was glad to hear it; gladder still when I saw your name in caps at the masthead, where I hope it will remain long after your illustrious sire and your subscribers have joined the angels on the far-away shore.

The greatest editors of the world grew up in the business. Benjamin Franklin, Horace Greeley, Charles A. Dana, Aleck McClure, and a host of other beacon lights started as you are starting, so go to it! Make washing the rollers a joy rather than a task; set by hand each week some of the matter the other fellow could easily run up on the machine; read proof without resorting to those little cuss words that often speak sulphur; spell and punctuate properly; cultivate your Dad's trenchant literary style; and then some day—perhaps not in mine—the world will take off its hat as you pass along, and people will say, "That's Brown Focht, the great American journalist."

I welcome you to the ranks. As your dad well knows, I am old enough in years to be your grandfather, yet I am young enough in heart to welcome you, my lad, as a brother.

God's blessing upon you in all things!

Sincerely, yours,

HOWARD E. BUTZ.

MR. BROWN FOCHT,
Lewisburg, Pa., December 26, 1918.

To have acquired and held the confidence and friendship of Howard Butz for nearly 40 years is one of the proudest testimonials to which we will ever care to point. To him in this temporary farewell, in this afterglow following the sunset, might be fittingly applied the words of James G. Blaine in his eulogy on the martyred Garfield:

"Let us think that his dying eyes read a mystic meaning which only the rapt and parting soul may know. Let us believe that in the silence of the receding world he heard the great waves breaking on the farther shore and felt already upon his wasted brow the breath of eternal morning."

And of the last sentence by Secretary John Hay in his masterpiece on William McKinley, when he spoke of "how he loved, revered, and served his country, and showed in his life how a citizen should live and, in his last hour, taught us how a gentleman could die."

Americanism.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. BUCHANAN,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I have speculated with profound interest over our indifference to the very grave importance and value of our cherished political ideals. It is incumbent upon us to impress in every possible way the real doctrines we profess, if our republican Government is to survive. Loose language and indifference to what should be held as sacred in the application of American principles is a danger we can not afford to ignore.

It is entirely possible that the political heresies injected into American life is largely due to thoughtlessness and to carelessness in our common disregard of what is vital in our political creed. It is very likely that the vicious and shameful madness to which so many of our communities were subjected lately and in earlier outbreaks were attributable largely to our own blindness and neglect. We have not fully exercised as a people the guardianship of the liberties committed to our trust. That we have drifted from the safe mooring and anchorage of first principles we are compelled to admit. That representative democracy has lapsed from the teachings of the fathers not even a superficial student will deny. Our original standards have been lowered to the wild winds of fanaticism and ignorance. We are worshiping at alien shrines, and false doctrines steadily weaken our strongholds of safe and sane practical democracy. And, Mr. Speaker, it lies at our own door, for we have forgotten and neglected the self-evident truth that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." In no way are we more guilty of unpardonable neglect than in the pernicious growth of loose political language and disregard of cardinal principles. We sadly need a holy name society to exemplify the value of purity in our political nomenclature. For instance, it is not at all reassuring to note the common, everyday prostitution of our fine old generic term "Americanism." It is so commonly misused that it has about lost its attractive and useful and forceful meaning. On the street, in the public gathering, even in Congress, it is frequently a meaningless and insignificant term. Often the editorial and leading article of the public print discusses Americanism, omitting entirely to give any clue to its appropriate significance. And yet, Mr. Speaker, the clear technique of patriotism is most impressive. It habituates us to the accurate conception of loyalty in the genuine citizen and imbues us with a true love of country.

"Words are things," and we are well aware of the truth of the proverb. Even ordinary language is sometimes so badly used that it makes trouble, as every lawyer knows. The slightest mistake in language, even a mistaken letter in a word, has many times proved a serious blunder. I am no purist, and I am not posing as a language critic, but if the loyal citizenship of the United States is not interested in the phraseology that expresses his patriotism, it is high time to study his lesson. As I see it, Americanism should suggest and convey the broad and deep sense of its fundamental value. Every time it is used it should be so terse in its application that any audience would instantly catch the thought and meaning. Its appeal is more than that of the superficial exponent of American character and of American spirit. It goes to the deep basic principles on which rest the birth and growth and power of this unique western Republic.

It is vital to our existence that the philosophy of our Government and its institutions be thoroughly understood and grafted into our consciousness; and should be grown in our political faith. Our welfare depends on righteousness in thought, word, and deed. And in no way can anything that strengthens the truth in our national life be omitted or neglected. To inspire devotion to our country its creed must be expounded to carry conviction to the depths of our nature, far deeper than any surface impression. There is a far profounder sense in every sentiment and fact of American life than is presented in the blazonry of the parade. There is a meaning to our flag far nobler than is conveyed by its visual beauty. It is more than a symbol of power.

Its associations and its story are written in the lives of the people and the fellowship of the millions who abide by its laws. Its entire history is a transcript of the indestructible gospel of human liberty. And these eternally sacred things that unfurl and wave with its folds are greater and grander than the applause when the harrangue over Old Glory stirs the shouts of the multitude.

Americanism signifies the distinctive thing that underlies and molds and sustains American character. It is all-embracing in the weave and web of our constitutional fabric. It is the very inspiration of American life, and it is the soul of America itself. American character is born and bred on American soil of American blood and was nourished at the breasts of American motherhood and grew to American manhood on the very elixir of the principles of human liberty.

American spirit is another thing. It is of the blood and is temperamental. Its energies are qualities grown in the open air, on the campus, on the farm, and in the gymnasium.

It comes from the athletic field and thrives in the crisp air of the mountain and in the training camps of discipline and of authority. It is the schooling that develops and insists on respect and obedience when the authority of the law is in command, and it grows into the very fiber of our citizenship. American spirit is that second nature that springs and prospers in Anglo-Saxon blood and grows by its indomitable momentum toward the inevitable superiority of its destiny.

I yield to no man, Mr. Speaker, in my admiration for all that the term American manhood implies. My pride knows no limit for the superb qualities of its prowess, its enterprise, and its splendid achievements. It has been tried and proved on every field and by every form of manly power and savage force, and never has its spirit flagged nor its strength diminished. It has successfully coped wherever the physical man has been tested in competition the world over. In all the arenas of intellectual combat its victories have reflected honor upon the American name.

But what is the Americanism so much discussed to-day?

I have pondered its flippant use, and regret the shallow misconception of its dignity and its value in these times when cant and political insincerity go hand in hand.

It is a sore trial to him who believes in the full scope and meaning of representative democracy to suppress the resentment he feels when he sees the perils that cumulate with the disrespect that shatters the American ideal. Such is one of the insidious influences that are eating away our intrinsic Americanism. If a household term that harkens back to the throes of our birth describes nothing but the passing heroism of the splendid day, what becomes of the principles and purposes that justified the sacrifice and has sustained us in our right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"? These substantial fundamentals must suffer when our very countersigns are degraded to the prostituted vision of the alien and the demagogue.

No wonder if this peaceful and prosperous people are torn and terrorized by the constant riot of the economic world. No wonder that indecision in the discussions of the council chambers of the Nation fails to allay the alarm that springs from the restless turmoil.

How can it be otherwise when the gospel of the creed of the Republic is expounded by erratic and fantastic aliens and demagogues who can never know what true Americanism means?

What can we expect when we commit the interpretation of the truths we hold as sacred and self-evident to profane lips, which disseminate perverted views through ignorance and malice, and which delight to preach sedition and practice its destructive principles?

But the solid in American character is sound and will hold its own by every test. The Republic will right itself under the inspired leadership of truth and honor.

Gloom and anxiety will break before the rising tide of conservative power, which is so sure to sweep to the gutter the irresponsible and dangerous elements who have, with no gratitude and with no appreciation of the great privileges of the free government they have enjoyed, plotted its destruction.

But we know in what manner of men we trust, and they will not fail us. Let us see: When the mightiest problems that ever engaged the thought of man were thrust into our consideration we sprang to the momentous duties of the hour. Judicial America, with instinctive care, weighed them all, and without a quibble decided our course, measured by the standards of American justice and right.

When "grim-visaged war" threatened mankind and bore down upon our provincial people before we could count the cost or figure its scope, and with no time to prepare, heroic America committed her ship of state to the maddened waters without a selfish motive and without a reservation.

When the frightful tide surged at the beck of a cruel and centralized nationalism, and our "force without stint" was pledged to cooperate in the great international struggle for civilization and humanity, we spoke the ringing accents of American pride and chivalry as we faced the tremendous task.

When our mobilized Nation called to the colors our young manhood and womanhood, and created an unprecedented Army and Navy with incredible dispatch, we scored the most wonderful feat of all time by the hustle and genius of American activity and power.

When our Navy eclipsed imagination in transporting to the shores of France an army of millions with its vast equipment, impossible save by the limitless resources and superhuman will of this dauntless Republic, it astonished the world by the infinite grasp of American discipline, its intrepid daring, and the marvelous skill of its seamanship.

When, to meet the military emergency of the countless demands of the well-nigh impossible construction of harbors and camps, and barracks and roads, and every conceivable facility needed to win the war on alien soil was accomplished, a new chapter was written in the annals of American push and efficiency.

When, like magic, that untrained host of young America was whipped into the compact and mobile American Expeditionary Forces, under the direction and leadership of American military genius, it was the triumphant exploit of the faculty for organization so well known to the expert militant American captains of industry.

In the acid test of campaign and battle, whenever the fabulous Hindenburg line was to be broken and its insuperable barriers crumbled before the irresistible dash and momentum of a Pershing attack, there was written again, again, and again the unfading glory of American arms.

And we could add many to the great feats inherent and incident to the military and naval morale of American spirit and power.

But, Mr. Speaker, when all the unrivaled graces of American manhood are noted, if we go no deeper we fail to grasp the sublimated Americanism that attracts the statesman and grips the historian and leads the world.

Time would fail us to name and rate the qualities of American genius that have overcome every obstacle to American growth at home and abroad.

Many and monumental as they are, they can not fathom the trancendent soul of Americanism nor translate the genius of its meaning. The mental, physical, and spiritual elements that combine to create distinguished character in the individual or the community are not monopolized by any one people. They are not peculiar to Anglo-Saxon blood. They are not foreign to the heroic make-up of virile man in any part of the world. But in all manly qualities the American ranks above the commonplace. To him who thrills with pride as he contemplates his native land and reviews the good old colony times there come hallowed memorials of the simple life, when the oracles of civil and religious liberty opened the vista of free government to the champions of human freedom and the fathers of our country, who were the giants of those days, became the inspired heroes of all time. And when royalty and loyalty were synonymous in the vocabulary of the tyrant the fires of freedom blazed on the altar of American liberty. Americanism first saw the light when oppression and persecution fired the spirit of independence in our liberty-loving forbears of that historic day. And the same dangers called the same American championship to the rescue when, in our day, civilization itself hung in the balance.

As we triumphed by successful war in seventy-six, when we were but the infant personality of American independence in its cradle; as the power of right against might was exemplified in that unequal struggle; and, as was realized, the dream of the ages in the creation of this Republic, so is it to-day. When that selfsame challenge—"nearer, clearer, deadlier than before"—rang out its boasted supremacy and menaced mankind its doom was sealed by this grown-up giant of the West. As it was in the illustrious triumph of American arms for American ideals in '76, so it is in our Titanic overseas contest for humanity in the arena of an expanded world. With the cry of victory on our lips and with the memory of the principles enunciated in our great declaration, the birth of the Republic was the inevitable and crowning glory.

And now, in the infinite measure of world-wide problems devolving upon us for solution, because of our unconquerable battle line, who can doubt the ability or the wisdom with which we will respond to the unavoidable demands of the final settlement.

In the hard and stupendous trial, shoulder to shoulder with the experienced veterans of war-worn Europe, our untried and untrained boys proved once more the dauntless spirit of American blood and the measureless power of its resourceful manhood.

Our military and naval exploits are again the vouchers for American victory. Our American name is just as unselfish and unsullied as when we plucked bright honor for ourselves in our fight for civil and religious liberty on our own shores. We were more than generous when we expended ourselves and all we hold and made it a community interest for allied but alien peoples in distant lands, and by that sacrifice the clouds of impending disaster are lifted from the people of the earth.

But the cry, "Watchman, what of the night?" is heard. Does it portend dark hours for the Republic at the hands of clashing and conflicting interests? Surely not, for abiding hope and confidence reply: "The morning—the morning cometh and also the night."

But, Mr. Speaker, brilliant and bold as was our surpassing valor then and now, splendid as our feats of arms have ever been, our military record is not our supreme claim for distinctive honor and merit. Physical courage has been characteristic of the virile individual and people, in every era, nor can it be discounted or discredited. As an element of character in the individual or in the group, grit and pluck are the soul of heroism and are essential when "knighthood is in flower." But feats of physical prowess and intellectual daring, however conspicuous, do not eclipse the fundamental and priceless values that come from the brain and heart and hand of the constructive ability that plans and develops for human welfare and happiness.

Certainly the strong man—Samson and Hercules and Theseus, and all the symbolic types of strength and power that overcome and overthrow—will command our inborn love for the heroic.

But after the conflict comes the survey of the battle field, and the result must be weighed and determined by the quiet processes of intelligence and thought.

When the tide of revolution had swept from our shores the foes of independence and the priceless boon of freedom was ours, constructive measures for the future were incumbent upon the leaders and authorities of colonial affairs.

With the same fortitude and patience and intrepid character that had immortalized them in their struggle for independence, the great personalities of revolutionary fame set themselves to the difficult task of creative work. And to say they succeeded is more than superfluous, for the story is familiar to all, and the incalculable blessings of our daily life constantly declare to us the fatherhood and motherhood of our pride—

> Not that we deduce our birth
> From loins enthroned and rulers of the earth,
> For higher yet our proud pretensions rise;
> The sons of parents passed into the skies.

It is not worth while to detail the experiences that led to the adoption of the Constitution under which our Government was formed. That intensely interesting subject, so familiar to our intelligent citizens, has been a fireside story for more than a century. A cursory glance is as far as we can indulge ourselves to-day. We know that the heat of controversy over its consideration and adoption by the committee representing the 13 original States was continued by the legislatures of those States and discussed by each one of them in exhaustive debate.

It would be more than a "twice-told tale" to comment on the growth of the sentiment through June and July of 1776, when the historic Fourth became a memorable date for all time.

It is not essential, though always engaging to patriotic thought, to dwell upon the evolution of the Articles of Confederation, coincident and associated as they were with the adoption of the great Declaration.

Such details would be trite, impertinent, and tiresome. But it is interesting to note that the time required to write and adopt the Declaration of Independence included the Fourth of July, 1776; that the time to produce the Articles of Confederation extended to November 15, 1777, and they were not adopted by all of the 13 States until March 2, 1781. From 1776 to 1789 our governmental life was regulated by the tentative authority of the Articles of Confederation. They served us well through the War for Independence and for some years afterwards. But the "more perfect Union" was a necessity clearly seen by the patriotic statesmen who had been closely connected with the young Republic from the days of its conception.

Through these leaders the Constitutional Convention was assembled on the 25th day of May, 1787. It unanimously chose George Washington as the presiding officer, and four months were consumed in its labors. Their concentrated thoughts and tireless ability—their inspired statesmanship through four months of unremitting toil—were rewarded with the drafted charter of American liberty. Our organic law had been written, and was ready and in shape for critical inspection, ready to verify the truth of the well-known eulogy of Gladstone, who declared: "The American Constitution is the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

The peerless expression of American constructive genius had at last succeeded in formulating the long-sought ideals of government. The dream of humanity, in its search for an efficient barrier against the usurpations of arbitrary and despotic power, was at last realized in this consummate expression of man's fondest hope.

After the world's disappointment and humiliation over its experiments and efforts for relief from the defects of human government, this great instrument of organic unity and regulated conduct impressed the wavering senses like the revelation of a New Testament of the political scriptures. But the throes of labor were yet to throb with pain before the birthright of freedom could be entailed in fee simple. It had yet to run the gauntlet of acceptance or rejection by the Thirteen Confederated Colonies, known, even then, as "the United States of America."

Plato's Elysium and More's fantastic Utopia and all the haunting delusions of time vanished to their lands of impracticable fiction when the accepted and welcomed decree to create the American Republic advanced its standards.

It is here, Mr. Speaker, that Americanism was conceived and born. The Constitution of the United States embodies every element that justifies the term; only as we are affected by its organic peculiarities and distinctive ethics may we appropriately and consistently adopt and use that characteristic and illustrious expression. If we are Americans just because we own and occupy American territory, in what respect do we differ from the savage from whom we took it by force? If we identify Americanism with physical courage and power as our main traits of manhood, wherein are we superior to any people whose valor and indifference to danger have marked the earth with ruin? The great captains of the past are still the exemplars and exponents of military leadership by whose side we claim no exceptional comparison. In literature and in the arts and sciences, while we have kept the pace, our achievements have not written the American name above the celebrities of other lands and older civilizations. In many instances we have successfully coped with them, and sometimes we have surpassed them and led the world. But we are satisfied with the average which we have well maintained with the foreign competitor in all the phases of life.

In the business world we are leaders. Our captains of industry are veritable genii in the field of material enterprise and development. Our inventive talent has won imperishable honor and has not been eclipsed. In the realm of statesmanship our record is superlative. Our great constructive thinkers are our household gods. They are enshrined in the American heart for all time. No statesman of any age can stand with Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and others of their day and ours who were the inspired authors and pioneers and champions of the Constitution of the United States of America. In the achievement of that marvelous instrument of organic humanity there is no parallel. It is essentially American by its birth, by its growth, and by every one of its unique provisions for free government. And it is stamped with the stamp of genuine Americanism through and through. If there is anything distinctive in American thought, American spirit, or American character, it is because these principles of our constitutional lives have been vitalized by the breath of liberty, without which the Constitution itself is nothing. It alone is authority for the ideas and the principles that are to-day prostituted in all the meaning and the sanctity that belong to our great charter of human freedom and human rights by the narrow bigotry of sectional and partisan and hypocritical sentimentalism. In its proclamation of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," the self-evident right of every normal human being to assume control of personal and proprietary affairs is emphasized. This sacred right of individual liberty is conferred by law on the day of mature age. At 21 childhood has passed and the dignity of manhood, with all the responsibilities of the citizen, must be assumed. Thenceforth individual self-government charges him with accountability for every personal act and holds him amenable and liable for every abuse of others or of himself. This self-evident fact leads inevitably to the family as the first unit of government, which establishes itself by necessity. It organizes intuitively and naturally, and automatically becomes governmental, and growing into the community develops the larger and more important bodies of civilized society known to us by familiar names.

The spirit of independence, coincident with human nature itself, has been the irresistible impulse toward free government in every age. It lies at the root of civilization, and expands spontaneously with the evolution of the human race. This spirit of independence, which constitutes the very lifeblood of manhood, and circulates with every heartbeat of the genuine American, is the primary and principal motive of the Constitution of the United States, and its inspiration was the passion for local self-government, the sole and exclusive theory of concrete, applied, and practical democracy. It is the foundation requirement on which must rest the efficiency of all law which operates by the consent of the governed. This local self-government fired the heart of the Pilgrim and speeded the Mayflower to its anchorage at Plymouth Rock. It was the prayer and the hope of the Puritan, the Huguenot, and the Moravian that enabled them to brave the perils of an ocean voyage and to endure the hazards and dangers of a savage frontier that they might worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

It was the right of local self-government that controlled the great master spirits and creative minds of the American Revolution to make the Constitution teach the rights of civil and religious liberty. These rights and their related guaranties are the specific essentials that confer upon us the Americanism of which we so proudly and justifiably boast.

In the confusion of these doubtful times it is plain that we are demoralized and drifting from the safety of the cardinal principles of our written and verified organic law, and that we should steer at once to the tried and well-known harbor of the Constitution of our fathers.

The lure of the expedient should not longer delude by the devices of a temporary and shifting ideal. The substantial and permanent and dependable truth must be recognized and applied to the reconstruction of our national character, if we are to exist and prosper in our national Americanism. Our splendid past was never guilty of the showy bluster of any single reformatory doctrine or measure of annihilation to accomplish that cure and correction of mere ailments, which by all analogy can only be treated by the sovereign States through the regulative laws and penalties for misconduct.

Our glorious past was deeply spiritual, and we were bred in the solemn conviction that the foundation stone of liberty was laid in the abiding "declaration and testimony" of free government. We enshrined, deep in our heart, the constitutional privileges we enjoyed, as the exponent and synonym of unalterable local self-government, and the confirmation of its related precepts and practices. The right of personal, individual freedom to apply the privileges of civil and religious liberty according to the dictates of conscience, together with free speech and the freedom of the press in the dissemination of independent views on topics of general and patriotic character and interest was and is now the soul of the constitutional prerogative. And that is at present and always will be the unadulterated and genuine Americanism to which we can swear allegiance and proclaim as distinctive and true and to the manner born.

To-day the ideas and terms of what we feel are sacred in patriotic parlance, and noble in the generous liberalities of our great Republic, are bandied about as trivial and contemptible and made vague and vicious by indefinite and doubtful application.

Surely the crises of the day will be able to summon the statesmanship that can lead us in righteousness, peace, and prosperity, and if, as our unerring compass, the Constitution has proved infallible, may we not still depend on its illuminating power to guide us safely on the way? There is nothing superior to that old tried instrument of statecraft, and we must hold to it as the divinity that shapes our end.

Founded in the nature and needs of man, identified with the material efficiency of the Government, suited to the common customs of social order, endeared by its fine ideals of altruism and philanthropy, mutual and benevolent in its purposes and ministry, sound and sacred in its doctrines of equality, admired and indorsed by the wisest and best of men, the Constitution of the United States stands an authority for the primary principles of liberty, and a model for organized free Government without precedent and without a peer.

In the District of Columbia and in many cities throughout the United States schools are maintained at public expense for the purpose of teaching Americanism. Unfortunately, in many instances the lessons in these schools are confined to teaching the English language, home economics, and kindred subjects. There is no doubt that the teaching of these subjects is very laudable and necessary to the immigrant seeking to become familiar with the manners and customs of his adopted country, the greatest country in the world, but is it not more important that he should become imbued with the spirit of our forefathers, who wrested our fair land from the savages and suffered on the field of battle that this country should indeed become the "land of the free and the home of the brave"? It is just as important that the history of the trials and sacrifices our forefathers underwent from colonial days to the present in gaining our liberty, formulating and adopting our Constitution, and establishing and conducting our Government should be taught. Every citizen should teach real Americanism by precept and example and let the true light of Americanism shine forth to other nations of the world, lighting the way to freedom and justice. It is also the duty of every American citizen to preserve uninjured this priceless legacy transmitted to us. Let each real American at the end of each day, week, month, and year ask himself the question, "What have I done to instill Americanism and preserve the heritage transmitted to me?" For my part I can truthfully say that by every effort of hand, head, and heart I have done all in my power to teach true Americanism, to preserve uninjured my Government, and to serve my country during peace and war, individually and officially. To that end, as a Member of Congress, when our flag was insulted, American lives sacrificed, and American citizens sent to the bottom of the sea without warning by German submarines, I voted for war against the Imperial Government of Germany. Further endurance would have been national cowardice and disgrace. After we declared war I voted for the selective draft as the most effective, efficient, and expeditious manner to raise an army sufficient to overcome the enemy and at the same time preserve, as far as possible, the productive resources of our country. Thereafter I supported every war policy requested by the Commander in Chief of our organized forces, which brought to a successful termination the most unselfish war on our part ever waged in the history of the world.

In order that the blessings of government, like the dews from heaven, might descend upon us all, I have supported many measures that have been of vast benefit to the people of the entire country as well as to the people of my home State and district, among which may be mentioned the following legislation:

1. For carrying out the provisions of the act establishing a Bureau of Animal Industry to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and disseminate information concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products.
2. To prepare and disseminate reports on animal industry.
3. For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the inspection of work relative to the existence of contagious diseases of animals.
4. For investigating the disease of tuberculosis of animals, for its control and eradication, methods of treatment and prevention, independently or in cooperation with farmers' associations, State, or county authorities.
5. For investigations and experiments in animal husbandry.
6. For experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with State agricultural experiment stations.
7. For scientific investigations in diseases of animals.
8. To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned or with individuals, to make such investigations and demonstrations as may be necessary in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States.
9. Voted for Federal aid for State schools and colleges and for vocational educational measures.
10. Voted for measure to require Government to educate and train soldiers disabled in the war with Germany.
11. Advocated and voted for the measure to increase the pay of school-teachers in the District of Columbia.
12. To cooperate with the States, through their respective highway departments, in the construction of rural post roads.
13. For construction and maintenance of roads.
14. For investigations of the best methods of road making and the best kind of road-making material and for furnishing expert advice on road building and maintenance.
15. I favor keeping faith with the people in the matter of good-roads construction in the United States and pledge myself to the policy of carrying on this work in each and every county in the State. I will see to it that every county shares in these appropriations and has a fair deal. I have the friendship and confidence of the various departments of the Federal Government that have to do in various ways with this question of road building, and it will be my desire and purpose to see that justice is done to all the counties in this matter.
16. Helped to pass the good-roads act, which appropriated millions for building roads by cooperation between county, State, and Federal Government, these roads to lead from the farms to the towns and cities.
17. For investigating the history and habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, the study of insects affecting the health of man and domestic animals, and ascertaining the best means of destroying those found to be injurious.
18. For investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, and sugar cane.
19. For investigations of insects affecting such crops, including insects affecting the potato, sugar beet, cabbage, onion, tomato, beans, and peas.
20. For the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production and the study of cereal diseases.
21. For the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops.
22. For the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and carrying on the war with Germany by gathering authoritative information concerning the food supply, by increasing production, by preventing waste of food supplies.
23. To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the relative utility and economy of agricultural products for food, clothing, and other uses in the home, with special suggestions, plans, and methods for the more effective utilization of such products for these purposes.
24. Helped to pass law taking tariff tax off of bagging and ties and agricultural implements.
25. Helped to ratify law providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.
26. Have defended at all times the South's plan and policy of race separation in schools and churches and railroad trains, contending that this was the wisest and best way to handle the race problem.

27. Advocated separate cars for negroes and whites in the District of Columbia, city of Washington, and voted for law prohibiting their intermarriage.

28. Advocated and helped to bring about the separating of the races in the Government departments at Washington, placing whites in one room and the negroes in another.

29. Helped to establish the Bureau of Markets, giving needed and valuable assistance and information to both producer and consumer.

30. For investigating and reporting upon farm drainage and upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands which may be made available for agricultural purposes.

31. To make investigation relating to the production, transportation, storage, preparation, marketing, manufacture, and distribution of agricultural food products.

32. To carry into effect the provisions of an act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States.

33. To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make studies of cooperation among farmers in the United States in the matters of rural credits and other forms of cooperation in rural communities; to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information growing out of these studies.

34. To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the several States in the employment of agents to acquire and diffuse useful information connected with the distribution and marketing of farm products.

35. For investigation and demonstration within the United States to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale.

36. For investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from the tropical regions and for the improvement of cotton.

37. For investigating, demonstrating, and promoting the use of standards for the different grades, qualities, and conditions of cotton, and for investigating the ginning, grading, stapling, baling, marketing, compressing, and tare of cotton.

38. For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods for meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil.

39. To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the United States cotton futures act.

40. To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the existence of the pink cotton bollworm in Mexico, and to prevent the establishment of such insect in the United States by the employment of all means necessary.

41. To prevent the movement of cotton and cotton seed from Mexico into the United States, to make surveys to determine the actual distribution of the pink bollworm in Mexico, and to exterminate local infestations in Mexico near the border of the United States in cooperation with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities.

42. To conduct surveys and inspections in Texas or in any other State to detect any infestation and to adopt necessary control measures.

43. On account of the menace to cotton culture in the United States arising from the existence of the pink bollworm in Mexico the Secretary of Agriculture, in order to prevent the establishment and spread of such worm in Texas and other parts of the United States, is authorized to make surveys to determine its actual distribution in Mexico; to establish in cooperation with the States concerned a zone or zones free from cotton culture on or near the border of any State or States adjacent to Mexico; and to cooperate with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities in the extermination of the local infestations near the border of the United States.

44. Advocated and helped to take away from cotton exchanges final decision in the matter of settling disputes arising between buyer and seller regarding grades named in contract and aided in placing a provision in the law requiring the Secretary of Agriculture through expert cotton men in the department to determine the grade and classification of the cotton in dispute, thus requiring the seller to deliver spinnable cotton and the grade named in the contract. This required the seller to call upon the producer for real cotton with which to fill his contract.

45. Aided in the fight on the 28 grades of stuff called cotton tendered in settlement of future contracts on the exchanges, which caused the farmers of the South to be robbed of millions of dollars every year through this system alone.

46. Aided in passing a law which reduced the number of grades from 28 to 10, thus enabling the buyer to compel the seller to deliver real cotton—cotton that represented the real crop—and not the dog-tail stuff that used to be kept and tendered on exchanges in settlement of future contracts. Under this new plan, when the delivery of cotton was demanded, the seller had to go into the spot market and buy the cotton from the farmers and merchants with which to fill his contract, and the exchange was in this way in a measure made to help distribute the crop.

47. Voted appropriation to carry out provisions of the act to secure cotton statistics which enabled the farmers, merchants, and bankers of the cotton-growing States to handle the cotton business intelligently and in a businesslike way. The Government heretofore was publishing only the reports of cotton ginned, and the cotton spinner had all the information that he needed regarding cotton produced, but the farmer and merchant did not have any authentic information regarding the consumption and exportation of cotton.

48. Voted for appropriation to carry out provisions of the act for the Government to gather and publish statistics giving the amount of cotton consumed each month by the cotton mills of the United States, the amount of cotton on hand from time to time at the mills and warehouses of the country, the amount exported each month, and the amount of old cotton left over at the end of the year. Before this much-needed information was obtained the speculators would give out false and misleading reports regarding the amount of cotton being consumed and exported. When certain speculators and spinning interests in the East and in New England demanded that a price be fixed on cotton and two bills were introduced in the House—one to fix the price at 15 cents and the other at 20 cents—it was found that the purpose of certain Members of the House who did not live in the cotton-growing States was to fix the price at not more than 20 cents a pound, and I fought the proposition bitterly, and by helping to defeat it prevented distress and suffering in the South and saved millions of dollars to the farmers, merchants, and bankers of the cotton-growing States.

49. In the fall of 1918 and spring of 1919, when foreign interests and bear speculators in America united their forces in one mighty effort to break down the price of cotton in the United States and succeeded in breaking the exchange price from $40 to $75 a bale, when the banks of the South had loaned large sums of money on cotton, and when these banks continued to carry the loans, even after the price of cotton had been beaten down below the amount on which the banks had made the loans, certain speculative and spinning interests tried to get the Government to arbitrarily withdraw from the local banks Federal reserve aid, so that the farmers and merchants would be forced to sell their cotton, although to do so meant financial loss and distress throughout the cotton-growing States. Then it was that I, with other Members from the cotton-growing States, declared that the scarcity of cotton and the large world demand made cotton the finest collateral in the world and its speedy rise in price a certainty, and that the Government should not lend itself to the mean and unholy purpose of conscienceless speculators who were seeking to rob the cotton producers of the fruits of their toil.

50. Have advocated and helped to pass laws providing for the publication and distribution of bulletins and periodicals on diversified farming and scientific agriculture. They deal with every phase of modern life upon the farm, including the health of human beings and the health and care of farm animals.

51. Aided in the fight in the Democratic caucus to require the Federal reserve banks to loan money on cotton-warehouse receipts.

52. Helped to pass the farm-loan banking system. Under this system farmers have borrowed more than $300,000,000 with which to buy new farms and lift mortgages from old ones.

53. Helped to pass the Smith-Lever agricultural extension act, which gathers, publishes, and distributes throughout America the best thought and methods touching the various phases of profitable, up-to-date farming and scientific agriculture, and it is the most valuable and comprehensive farm demonstration plan ever devised.

54. Aided in passing the law providing for the distribution among the counties in the various States of Army trucks and other machinery to be used in the construction and maintenance of public roads.

55. When the fathers and mothers of our American boys who gave their lives in defense of our country and the civilization of the world asked that the bodies of their brave sons be brought back and buried in American soil, I urged the passage of legislation to fulfill this obligation to these patriotic fathers and mothers of America and bring the precious bodies of their boys back home.

56. I voted for and helped to pass the Federal reserve banking act, which took away from Wall Street the power to produce a panic.

57. I have opposed in every way measures that seek to foist upon America any plan or system that smacks of military despotism.

58. Have opposed universal military training, saying that I would oppose it on account of the negro problem in the South if there were no other reasons for doing so.

59. I helped to secure legislation to send out of the country those who advocated the overthrow of our Government. Under this law these deadly enemies of our country are being sent back to their own countries.

60. In regard to the railroad question, I insist that the railroads must be put upon a paying basis, with reasonable profits, and then required by law to serve the public efficiently, and that those who work for the roads must be paid such wages as will permit them to share in the prosperity enjoyed by the roads, to the end that they and their families may live decently and worthily. Am the friend of both labor and capital and favor as few restraints as possible upon the proper activities of both. Have favored laws that protect and safeguard both human and property rights.

61. In the matter of differences or disputes arising between railroad employer and employees, I favor absolute justice to both in the matter of protecting and safeguarding the rights of both and safeguarding at all times the rights and interests of the public, which must be respected and safeguarded.

62. I fought centralization of government and never lost an opportunity to defend the doctrine of State rights.

63. Have supported every measure looking to the best interest and advancement of the cause of education.

64. I favor speedy action on the peace treaty and urge the repeal of all special laws growing out of the war that restrain and harass the citizen in the free and honest management of his own private business.

65. Have advocated in the House and elsewhere the doctrine that America and the other civilized nations should set up an international tribunal for the settlement of disputes by arbitration, to the end that the peace of the world may be preserved and the cruel and useless slaughter of human beings prevented.

66. As one of the conferees on the District of Columbia appropriation bill in the Congress just closed, in standing out against the 50-50 plan—that is, the Federal Government paying one-half the amount and the District the other half—we forced the Senate to agree to the Federal Government paying 40 per cent and the District of Columbia 60 per cent of the expenses of conducting the city government, resulting in saving the taxpayers of the country $2,200,000 per year. In many other instances, by my advocacy of economy, have cut the appropriations and saved large sums of tax money.

67. Voted to repeal the daylight-saving bill.

68. Voted against the Esch-Cummins railroad bill, which gave a Government-guaranteed profit to the railroads and contained other obnoxious provisions. I am opposed to the Government guaranteeing out of the taxpayers' money a profit to any corporation or individual.

69. The Republican majority in Congress reported a bill for the appropriation of $12,000,000 for the vocational training of disabled soldiers, which was insufficient for this great work, and I offered an amendment increasing the amount to $18,000,000, which met with Republican opposition, but was solidly supported by the Democrats and resulted in a $2,000,000 increase won against a Republican majority. It later developed that more than $18,000,000, the amount of my amendment, was needed, and it was appropriated at a succeeding session of Congress. The highest duty of the Government is to repair, as far as humanly possible, the disabilities incurred by our boys in the war.

70. Have been a member of the Appropriations Committee for five years, and have been faithful to my duty to the taxpayers during that entire service, advocating and practicing at all times strict economy, although at times it has been absolutely necessary to appropriate as high as $20,000,000,000 in one session of Congress.

71. On one occasion I cast the deciding vote in my committee which resulted in saving the taxpayers $300,000.

72. I voted against the Alaskan Railroad bill, which provided for the construction at Government expense of a railroad in Alaska, originally estimated to cost $35,000,000. At this time $48,000,000 have been appropriated, and $52,000,000 authorized for this purpose. When we take into consideration that Alaska is as large as the States of Washington, Oregon, California, and my own State of Texas, taken together; that it is mountainous and volcanic, with intensely cold climate, the sun shining only a few months in the year, making it unfit for agricultural purposes, and that all told there are not as many white inhabitants in this entire vast area as there are residents in Austin, Tex., it is evident that the construction of this railroad at such a great expense is not only premature but an extravagant waste of the taxes of the people, with no reasonable benefit resulting that is commensurate with the expense involved. When this Government-owned railroad is completed, its operation will constitute an enormous annual burden upon the taxpayers of the country with no returns from the investment.

73. As a member of the Appropriations Committee I initiated and put through that committee and through the House an appropriation for $40,000 for the renovation of the old post-office building at Austin, Tex., which was also passed by the Senate.

74. In every public-buildings bill that has been reported to the House and Senate I have had provision made for the construction of a post-office building at Georgetown and Taylor, Tex., and a post-office site in Lockhart, Tex. These bills failed of passage in the Senate, but when Congress passes a public-buildings bill I shall see that the above building projects in my district will be provided for.

75. I voted against nation-wide woman suffrage and nation-wide prohibition. In doing so, I carried out the old ideals of the South of State rights, in defense of which those who wore the gray sacrificed their all in the battle tides of the sixties. Both the above amendments were submitted to the States. The prohibition amendment has been legally ratified by 45 States, and it is now a part of the Constitution of our country. The suffrage amendment has been ratified by 35 States, and, in my opinion, will be ratified by the necessary three-fourths of the States before the election in November. It will then be a part of the Constitution of the United States; and I, with every other good citizen, will urge the enforcement and efficient administration of these as well as all other laws of our Government. I look upon these questions as settled, and they should no longer constitute division and dissensions among our people.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if we convince every citizen in every part of this broad country of ours that our Government is seeking to serve all the people, advance them morally, intellectually, and materially, and imbue them with the glorious history of our country, with the sacrifices made for its establishment and maintenance; that our public officials are striving to see that the blessings as well as the burdens of our Government shall rest equally upon the heads of all; that justice is administered to all and special privileges to none, and that it affords to all its citizens the greatest opportunities of any Government on the face of the earth to make their mark in life, by instructing themselves, by improving themselves, and by living for their fellow men, then will we have real Americanism that will challenge the admiration of the nations of the earth.

The Republican Leader.

I have done the State some service.—Othello.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. KING,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 25, 1920.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, on a bleak November morning, 1860, in the most humble surroundings, a boy was born. At the age of 6 he became an orphan, and as he then gazed in boyish awe into the inscrutable future who would have said that in this lad the elements existed which one day would make him a leader of the people?

From thence on one continuous struggle indicated his always forward way. Eighteen found him working as an Iowa farm hand. Thus physically equipped and reinforced by practical district-school education, like many another who preceeded him, he set his face to the West.

As a miner he dug with honest hands the minerals of the earth, as a railroad contractor he helped to throw across the continent the bands of steel which tied in commerce the East and the West.

As a citizen, with indefatigable industry, he wrought for the upbuilding and advancement of his community.

In due time his fellow citizens, recognizing his early contest with adversity and his public worth, in honor of his untiring efforts in behalf of the people, elected him a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress, and repeated such election for every succeeding Congress since then, save one.

For 22 years this faithful, honest, and effective man has stood not only as a Representative but as a live exponent of his great State.

The legislative escutcheon of this man bears no stain. The foul garments of scandal have not been heard to stir in his activities. His face still carries the clear, open countenance of the orphan boy, unmarked by the lines of error.

At the convening of the Sixty-sixth Congress the Republicans of the House, well knowing the unsettled condition of the Nation, the prevalent unrest of its citizens, and the disorder of its legislation, before embarking upon the river of doubt chose from among all others as their captain and pilot this individual who had so well been trained for the mission and in whom the citizens of his State and his country had great faith.

One year of his leadership has demonstrated his practical infallibility. The destiny not only of the party but of the Republic was in his hands. One false move and all might have been lost. Not many times before in our history has the ground trembled so threateningly beneath the feet of the Representatives of the people. Emerging from the trans-Atlantic war, which had thrown mankind into misery and madness, the situation of the United States has been one pregnant with dire possibilities. The highest statesmanship was demanded. Yet, with calmness, ability, and fortitude, this modest but resourceful man, step by step, move by move, has proceeded positively, certainly, and successfully toward the desired goal.

The victory is his. Extravagance and waste has fled before him. He has reintrenched constitutional privileges of the people. The dragon of tyranny has before this modern St. George withdrawn its talons from the horizon of our destiny. The full effect of his work in this cataclysmic period can not be truly comprehended by his contemporaries, but the future student of our times will write in a high place on the proscenium of history the name of this citizen, statesman, and patriot—FRANK MONDELL, of Wyoming.

Picture Brides.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RAKER,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the question of exclusion of Japanese from entry into the United States has been very acute. It is a question that will not be settled until settled right. There has been much said about the "gentlemen's agreement" between the United States and Japan and the admission of Japanese women thereunder, known as "picture brides." It was strongly contended that under this "gentlemen's agreement" these Japanese women should not be admitted. Since the two Governments entered into this agreement large numbers of the women—the so-called "picture brides"—have been admitted. There have been many admitted—it runs into the thousands.

Every effort was made to prevent this immigration. Partial results were obtained, from this work, when on December 20, 1919, the Government of Japan notified the United States that it had issued an order that no more passports would be issued to "picture brides" about to leave for the United States, after February 29, 1920.

This question has had my attention and consideration for the past nine years and more. Certain correspondence has passed between the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Labor, the Commissioner General of Immigration, and the commissioner of immigration at San Francisco, and myself. I insert some of this late correspondence as it is quite interesting, as well as instructive, on the "gentlemen's agreement" and the "picture brides."

That correspondence is as follows:

APRIL 2, 1920.

Hon. BAINBRIDGE COLBY,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: About December 20, 1919, the newspapers carried the story that the Japanese Government had issued an order that no more passports would be issued to the so-called "picture brides" to come to the United States, and had advised our State Department accordingly.

Is this order being carried out by the Japanese Government?

Would your department send me copy of this order?

Are our immigration officials carrying out their part and denying admission to these Japanese "picture brides"?

I am,

Yours, most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 6, 1920.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 2, in which you inquire as to the accuracy of the newspaper report that the Japanese Government has issued an order that no more passports will be issued to so-called "picture brides."

In reply I have to quote to you a statement as given to the press by the Japanese Embassy and published on December 22, 1919, reading as follows:

"The Japanese ambassador, on instructions from his Government, has the honor to make the following communication to the Government of the United States:

"The Japanese Government, placing supreme importance on the promotion of friendly relations between Japan and the United States and having carefully examined in that spirit the situation created by the question of the so-called 'picture brides,' have decided to adopt measures for the prohibition of such brides from proceeding to the continental United States."

It is understood that this control was made effective in Japan in February of this year. There has been no complaint in regard to the effective working of the measures adopted by the Japanese Government in this regard.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

BAINBRIDGE COLBY.

APRIL 2, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM B. WILSON,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SECRETARY: About December 20, 1919, the newspapers carried the story that the Japanese Government had issued an order that no more passports would be issued to the so-called "picture brides" to come to the United States, and had advised our State Department accordingly.

I am advised that notwithstanding this order, the immigration inspector and officials are still admitting such Japanese "picture brides" to land at the San Francisco port.

Are not these officials disobeying the law and regulations of your department in admitting these women? Can not some action be taken to prevent their future entry if, in fact, they are now being admitted?

Will you kindly advise me just what is the present status relative to admission of Japanese "picture brides"? I am,

Yours, most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

APRIL 13, 1920.

Hon. A. CAMMINETTI,
Commissioner of Immigration, Department of Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER: Some days since I wrote you in regard to Japanese picture brides. On April 10 I sent the following telegram to Commissioner of Immigration White at San Francisco:

"Hon. EDWARD WHITE,
"Commissioner of Immigration, San Francisco, Calif.:

"Are Japanese picture brides being admitted into the United States at the San Francisco port notwithstanding the order of the Japanese Government that no more passports would be granted to picture brides and they would be prohibited from proceeding to the continental United States? Kindly advise me.

"JOHN E. RAKER, M. C."

And to-day have received his reply, of date April 13, which is as follows:

"Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
"Washington:

"Referring your wire 10th instant, you advised 35 Japanese photograph brides arrived Fenyo Maru 8th instant, all having passports issued prior to February 29, which, I understand, though never officially advised, was the last day on which Japanese Government was to issue passports of picture brides.

"WHITE."

Would you kindly advise me as to the present position taken by your department, as well as the Department of Labor, on this subject, inasmuch as the Japanese Government has decided to adopt measures for the prohibition of allowing such brides to proceed to the continental United States.

Respectfully submitting the same, I am,

Yours, most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

MAY 24, 1920.

Hon. A. CAMINETTI,
Commissioner of Immigration, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER: From reports from San Francisco I note that another batch of 150 picture brides were admitted. What seems to be the matter? Is the Japanese Government breaking faith, and are they going to permit the picture brides to enter, notwithstanding their order? Under the order of the Japanese Government should not the department hold up and refuse admittance to these brides and by proper proceedings return them to Japan?

I wish you would let me know the situation in your office on this matter.

Respectfully submitting the same, I am,

Yours, most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 28, 1920.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: Answering your letters of the 24th instant, one of which was addressed to the Secretary of Labor and the other to the Commissioner General of Immigration, I beg to advise that the department wrote you quite fully with respect to the subject of Japanese picture brides on April 12 last. As you do not make reference to this letter in your two communications, under acknowledgment, it is quite possible that the same has never been brought to your attention. I am therefore inclosing a copy herewith, which seems to constitute about as complete a response to your request for information on the subject as it is possible for the department to make.

Very truly, yours, JOHN W. ABERCROMBIE, Acting Secretary.

APRIL 12, 1920.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, in which you advise that on or about December 20, 1919, the newspapers carried a story to the effect that the Government of Japan had issued an order that no more passports would be issued to "picture brides," about to come to the United States, and that said Government had advised the Department of State accordingly. You state that notwithstanding this order it appears that immigration officials are still admitting Japanese "picture brides" at the port of San Francisco. You ask, in this connection, just what is the present status under the immigration laws of Japanese "picture brides."

The department has never had official advices to the effect that the Government of Japan had discontinued, or intended to discontinue, the issuance of passports to Japanese women about to come to the United States after going through a ceremony of marriage, by proxy, under the laws of Japan, with a resident of the United States of their race. It has seen more or less comment in various newspapers concerning this supposed action of the Japanese Government, however. There appears to have been little, if any, cessation of the issuance by the Japanese Government of such passports, however, for these women still continue to arrive, armed with the necessary evidence of marriage by proxy to resident Japanese, and with passports issued apparently in regular manner.

Referring to the request made in the last paragraph of your letter under acknowledgment, the department believes that it can best advise you of the status of Japanese women coming to the United States under the circumstances above related by quoting from a letter which it addressed to the Secretary of State on August 25, 1919, as follows:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo (FE), inclosing for comment and recommendation a copy of a letter dated July 24, 1919, from Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN, United States Senator, having reference, among other things, to the immigration to this country of Japanese aliens, particularly women of that race. The desire to furnish certain statistics bearing on the contents of the Senator's letter which were only recently obtainable has prevented the earlier transmittal of comments and observations on so much thereof as relates to the subject of immigration from Japan.

"The understanding or agreement with Japan on the subject of immigration, often referred to as the 'Gentlemen's agreement,' was put into operation in 1908. The number of male and female arrivals from Japan, as well as departures for that country, before and since the date of the understanding and discussion of those statistics form another part of this communication."

As the Senator's letter suggests, a large percentage of the women who come here are of the class usually known as "picture" or "proxy" brides.

The question of the admission of this class as wives of Japanese domiciled in the United States has repeatedly—it might be said continually—received the earnest study and consideration of this department as well as that of your department. As you are aware, the agreement contains the stipulation (in substance) that Japan would issue "no passports good for the American mainland to either skilled or unskilled Japanese laborers, except to those who have previously resided in the United States, or the parents, wives, or children of Japanese residents."

The policy of the former Department of Commerce and Labor in dealing with this class of cases was to admit only after the performance of a marriage ceremony in accordance with the laws of this country, if the applicants were otherwise admissible under the general terms of the immigration law then in force and they presented passports issued under said agreement. This, in effect, allowed a "picture bride" while in an immigration station at a United States port to qualify as the wife of a resident of the United States in order to become admissible under the immigration law, something not contemplated by its provisions. In other words, a woman, no matter whence she might come, arriving at one of our ports without the qualifications required by law for entry might qualify by being permitted to do after arrival that which, as one of the necessary elements for admission, should have been a fact before arrival.

This department, on assuming jurisdiction of the enforcement of the immigration laws, did not regard the practice which was then being observed as satisfactorily solving the problem. However, no change was made pending the acquisition of the information necessary to establish a system that would meet the requirements of the law; but when the present immigration act, containing the illiteracy clause, was passed it became imperative on or before the taking effect thereof (May 5, 1917), as a percentage of the women who applied for admission as such wives had been found to be illiterate, to fix the legal status of these marriages.

In the absence of treaty provisions (and the treaty with Japan makes no provision therefor), the validity of a marriage is to be determined by the law of the place where it was contracted or celebrated (lex loci contractus), and if valid there it will generally be regarded as valid in any State or country in which the parties may subsequently reside, although it would have been invalid by the law of said subsequent domicile if contracted or celebrated there. The favored-nation clause in the treaty with Japan is an aid in the application of this doctrine.

It therefore became necessary to ascertain what was the law of Japan on the subject. The matter was accordingly made the subject of correspondence between this department and your department and between your department and the ambassador of Japan to the United States. On April 7, 1917, the ambassador, after informal discussions, presented, through your department (see your letter of Apr. 18, 1917), an excerpt from the civil code of Japan containing the marriage laws of that country. This not being altogether clear as to the so-called photograph marriages, this department, on April 24, 1917, following a study of said excerpt, stated that its purpose was to ascertain not only the terms of the law of Japan with respect to marriage, but also whether the laws of Japan provide for and make legal a marriage contracted under such laws while one party to the marriage is living in Japan on the date the marriage takes place and the other party is at the time actually in a foreign jurisdiction. Further correspondence ensued, and on April 30, 1917, your department referred to this department (your number 894,4054) a copy of a note from the ambassador, Mr. Sato, from which the following is quoted:

"I beg to state that in the law of Japan it is provided that marriage is complete and takes effect immediately upon its being notified, either in writing or orally, to the registrar by both parties with the participation in the act of at least two witnesses of full age and its being accepted by him; that if a document is employed for such notification it must be personally signed and sealed by the parties and the witnesses, but it is not necessary that the parties personally appear before the registrar; that if the notification is made orally, both the parties and their witnesses must personally appear before the registrar.

"There is no provision in the Japanese law specifically for a case where one of the parties to a marriage contract lives in Japan and the other under foreign jurisdiction, nor has there appeared before the court any case involving this point, for the reason that the places of actual residence of the parties concerned form no essential requirement for a marriage to be legalized. Such being the essence of the formal marriage in Japan, a Japanese man residing in this country can marry a Japanese woman residing in Japan by personally signing and affixing his seal to the document to be presented before the registrar in Japan, and the validity of such marriage is amply attested by the issuance of certified copy of the family registry bearing the official seal of the registrar, which document the so-called 'picture bride' proceeding to this country is always provided with.

"I may add that the marriage system of Japan being as hereinbefore stated, it would be inappropriate to use the phrase 'marriage by proxy' in relation to the subject under consideration."

After further informal consideration, in the course of which the ambassador submitted an exhaustive memorandum on the subject, and after the matter had been most carefully considered by the officials of the Department of Labor, including the Secretary, it was concluded, from the information then before the department, wholly aside from any question of policy involved, as a rule of administration as follows:

"That the validity of these marriages be recognized unless or until it is definitely shown that they are not legal marriages under the laws of Japan, or until it satisfactorily appears that the residence in the United States of one of the parties brings the consummation of the marriage ceremony within the jurisdiction of our laws; that proof of such marriages be required not only by a certified record of the registrar but also by a certified copy of the notification of marriage made out by the party to the same living in the United States, and that marriages at our ports be prohibited."

Orders to the Immigration Service, still in force, were issued accordingly.

It should be observed, in addition to the foregoing, that as to the class of marriages above discussed, the said agreement is claimed to affect such of them as are married under the provisions of the Civil Code of Japan referred to by providing that Japan will issue passports to the wives of "Japanese residents" of the United States. In the administration of the rule just cited such passports, so long as the agreement is in force, are accepted unless fraud or mistake in their issuance shall be made to appear.

This department deems it not inappropriate to invite attention to the fact that, according to information claimed as authentic, Japan is not the only country whose laws permit of the contraction of marriages while one of the contracting parties is in a foreign jurisdiction. Spain and Portugal, it is alleged, allow the marriage of a resident of one of those countries with a resident then in a foreign country by permitting representation of the absentee by an attorney in fact, appointed by power of attorney. There may be other nations that have like systems, differing in details, perhaps, from the systems claimed to exist in Spain and Portugal or from the Japanese method, but agreeing in effect.

Very truly, yours, LOUIS F. POST,
Assistant Secretary.

MAY 24, 1920.

Hon. BAINBRIDGE COLBY,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In re Japanese "picture brides."

About the 20th of December we were advised that the Japanese Government would grant no more passports to "picture brides," the order to take effect some time around the 1st of February is my recollection at this time. Since that order has taken effect large parties of "picture brides" have been admitted at the port of San Francisco. In April there were 149 admitted. I note from a press dispatch from San Francisco, under date of May 17, the following:

"JAPANESE BREAK FAITH.

"[By United Press.]

"SAN FRANCISCO, May 17.

"Despite assurances from the Japanese Government that 'picture brides' would be denied passports to this country 150 prospective brides of Japanese in this country arrived to-day on the liner Periso Maru.

"The Japanese officials explain that the passports for the women were granted before the official ban was decreed.

"Immigration Commissioner White will investigate the circumstances surrounding the admission of the 'picture brides,' he said."

Under the order of the Japanese Government can not some course be taken whereby we may enforce the gentlemen's agreement and this present lot of 150 "picture brides" be rejected and the same determination for future applicants for admission receive the same order from our officials in denying their admission.

It appears to me that this subject is worthy of very close investigation, to the end that this immigration of Japanese "picture brides" be prohibited.

Respectfully submitting the same, I am,
Yours, most truly, JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

MAY 29, 1920.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of May 24 in regard to the immigration of so-called "picture brides" from Japan.

In reply I have to advise you that the undertaking of the Japanese Government was to discontinue the issuance of passports to "picture brides" at the close of February last. It was made clear, however, that in accordance with the usual practice in Japan each passport and visé is good for six months; it is therefore probable that some "picture brides" will be found proceeding to the United States until the expiration of this period, namely, until the end of August next. This is more likely to be the case, in view of the fact that passage on Pacific vessels is very hard to obtain and must be applied for months in advance; but the next few months should show a marked diminution in the number of this class of arrivals.

The department finds no reason to doubt the effectiveness of the measures taken by the Japanese Government in this matter, as indicated by the very marked falling off in the number of immigrants of the class indicated since the Japanese Government's adoption of such measures. Should you, however, find evidence to the contrary, I beg to request that you communicate it for appropriate consideration by this department.

I am, sir, your obedient servant, BAINBRIDGE COLBY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1920.

Hon. EDWARD WHITE,
Commissioner of Immigration, San Francisco, Calif.:

Are Japanese picture brides being admitted into the United States at the San Francisco port, notwithstanding the order of the Japanese Government that no more passports would be granted to picture brides and they would be prohibited from proceeding to the continental United States? Kindly advise me.

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., April 12, 1920.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
Washington:

Referring your wire 10th instant, you advised 35 Japanese photograph brides arrived Tenyo Maru 8th instant, all having passports issued prior to February 29, which, I understand, though never officially advised, was the last day on which Japanese Government was to issue passports of picture brides.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
IMMIGRATION SERVICE,
San Francisco, Calif., April 23, 1920.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Again adverting to the subject of Japanese photograph brides arriving at this port, I have the honor to advise you that there were 61 females of the class mentioned who arrived on the steamship Anyo Maru on the 20th instant, and their passports all antedated February 29 last.

Respectfully, W. T. BOYCE,
Acting Commissioner.

MAY 24, 1920.

Hon. EDWARD WHITE,
Commissioner of Immigration, San Francisco, Calif.

MY DEAR MR. WHITE: I note in a dispatch from San Francisco by the United Press that the Japanese are breaking faith with the United States. This press dispatch states that 150 prospective brides arrived on May 17 on the liner Periso Maru, and that you were investigating the circumstances surrounding the admission of these brides with some hopes of their being excluded.

Under the order of the Japanese Government to issue no further passports, are not these picture brides trying to enter the United States unlawfully, and ought they not to be excluded? I am taking the matter up with the authorities here hoping that we will be able to have some definite determination on this matter and the continued stream of these people prohibited.

If you took a picture of this like the last one you sent me, I would appreciate it greatly if you would send me one. Any information that you can supply me regarding their admission and rejection, and the reason they are admitted, if at all, would be greatly appreciated.

Respectfully submitting the same, I am,
Yours, most truly, JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.

Pensions and Increase of Pensions.

SPEECH

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. KING,

OF UTAH,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Friday, April 23, 1920.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] addressed me I was stating that no opposition to the pending measure, or any pension bill, would be successful. It seems to be the accepted canon of conduct to approve all forms of pension legislation and discourage any opposition thereto. Senators who have the temerity to offer objections to pension bills or appropriations generally, if they are not censured by some of their associates, are regarded with rather ill-concealed displeasure. There are so many appropriation bills reported, and they come from so many different committees and sources, that they cease to attract attention and provoke little, if any, discussion, and secure the attendance of but a limited number of Senators while they are before the Senate. We seem to be living in the war period so far as the questions of figures and expenditures and appropriations are concerned. The statement is often heard that an appropriation which is sought carries "only $1,000,000," or "$65,000,000," the latter being the amount sought by the pending bill. We speak of $1,000,000,000 as our fathers spoke of $1,000.

The expenditures of our Government as late as 1800 were less than eleven million dollars. In 1830 they were only fifteen million dollars. In 1840 the annual expenses of the Government were twenty-four million dollars, and in 1850 a little more than forty millions of dollars. In 1860 the entire expenditures of the Government were less than sixty-four millions of dollars. During the Civil War the expenses were greater than in preceding years, and the highest amount was reached in 1865, when the aggregate expenditures were $1,295,099,290. In 1875 our annual budget was less than two hundred and seventy-five million dollars. In 1885 the expenses of the Government were but $260,226,935, and in 1890 the total amount was less than three hundred millions. It was not until 1899 that the half-billion-dollar mark was passed, and for that year the expenses of the Government were nearly six hundred and six millions of dollars. In 1900 the Government expended almost four hundred and eighty-eight millions, and in 1904 they reached more than five hundred and thirty-two millions. In 1908 the expenses of the Government were $621,102,391; 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912 exceeded this amount by approximately twenty-five millions of dollars for each year. In 1913 the ordinary expenses of the Government were nearly six hundred and eighty three millions, and in 1914 they were more than seven hundred million dollars. In 1915 our expenses recorded seven hundred and thirty millions, and in addition twenty-nine millions were appropriated for the Panama Canal and seventeen and a half million upon our public debt. In 1916 the ordinary expenses were only seven hundred and twenty-four million dollars and the expenditures for the Panama Canal were seventeen millions and the payment upon our public debt twenty-four millions.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the ordinary expenditures of the Government were $1,980,297,941. Of this amount $19,745,015 were required in Panama Canal operations, $25,000,000 were paid for the West Indian Islands, eight hundred and eighty-five millions were loaned to our Allies, and nearly nine millions were subscribed for Federal land-bank stock.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the ordinary expenses of the Government were $12,696,702,471. Of this amount $4,738,029,750 represented loans to our Allies, nineteen millions were devoted to Panama Canal operations, and sixty-five millions were utilized in the purchase of farm-loan bank stocks.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, $4,850,687,186 were expended by the War Department and $1,278,840,486 by the Navy Department. The Interior Department received an appropriation of more than two hundred and forty-four million dollars, the Shipping Board received more than seven hundred and seventy millions of dollars from the Federal Treasury, and one hundred and twenty millions were expended in the operation of the railroads.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, our expenditures were $18,514,879,955. Of this amount, $3,479,255,265 were loaned to our allies, and $86,000,000 were employed in the purchase of farm-loan bank stocks. Of this stupendous sum, the War Department received $8,995,880,266 and the Navy Department was allowed $2,002,310,785. The Shipping Board received $1,820,606,870 and $350,000,000 went to the Railroad Administration and $302,000,000 to the War Finance Corporation.

Under date of July 9, 1919, the former Secretary of the Treasury, Senator GLASS, in a letter to Mr. FORDNEY, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, stated that the expenditures for the war period amount to $32,427,000,000. Of that amount, $9,384,000,000, or about 29 per cent, were met out of the tax receipts and revenues other than borrowed money, and that on June 30, 1919, the gross public debt amounted to $25,484,000,000.

In a communication to the banking interests of the country made by former Secretary GLASS, he stated that he anticipated the Government receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, would approximate $6,535,000,000—$4,940,000,000 from internal revenue, $260,000,000 from customs, $3,000,000, from sale of public land, and $300,000,000 from miscellaneous sources.

During the war it was necessary to raise large sums by taxation, and billions of dollars were collected from the people largely through income and excess-profits provisions found in existing revenue laws. Notwithstanding that more than a year and a half have elapsed since the armistice was signed, war-revenue legislation is still upon our statute books, and billions of dollars annually are being taken from the people to meet the expenses of the Government, with no assurances from the party in power in Congress of economy in public matters or of relief from war-time taxation.

The total revenue collected from April 6, 1917, to October 31, 1919, from customs, income and profits tax, internal revenue, and miscellaneous revenues aggregated $11,280,000,000. The customs receipts during that period amounted to but $520,000,000, and income and profits taxes and internal revenue totaled $9,527,023,426. It will be observed that the revenue derived from customs constituted but an inconsiderable part of the aggregate receipts of the Government, being at an approximate ratio of 1 to 22.

The heavy burdens of taxation resulting from the war-revenue acts are being continued because of the lack of proper retrenchment and the extravagant and enormous appropriations which are daily being made by the legislative branch of the Government. Appeals for economy and reform have been unavailing, and, in my opinion, the appropriations which will be made and which will be required to cover expenditures by the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, will be between five and six billions of dollars; and legislation which is now under consideration, if enacted, will swell the demands upon the Treasury to at least $7,000,000,000. This heavy burden contributes to uncertainty in business and reacts unfavorably upon industrial conditions, including the prices of commodities. Most taxes in the last analysis are borne by the consumers; and there are many evidences that the billions paid as excess-profits taxes are shifted to the ultimate consumer.

Information imparted to the public from time to time concerning the conditions of many of the great manufacturing industries and large business enterprises reveals the fact that the heavy taxes paid by them to the Government have not been deducted from dividends or surplus but have been added to the cost of production and carried as a burden to those who are the final purchasers and consumers of their products. Business conditions of the United States are such as to demand the most serious consideration upon the part of all who are interested in the welfare of our country.

The employee and the middleman—indeed, all classes of society—are vitally interested in business conditions. The employer must be prosperous in order that there may be profitable labor for the employee. Excessive taxes are obstacles in the pathway of economy and prosperity. Congress should have considered the economic factors involved in the present-day situation. Rigid economies should have been practiced. Government agencies should have been restricted in their war activities, and thousands of employees of the Government should have been returned to their homes and to useful industry. Peace-time appropriations are required and peace-time revenues should be collected. There should have been important changes in our revenue laws and taxes materially reduced. But appeals for economy have been unheeded, and we have day by day added millions and tens of millions to the already oppressively burdened people of our country.

This bill carrying $65,000,000 is regarded with no more concern than if we were appropriating 65 cents. Senators must realize that with constantly diminishing exports the amount collected, even under present revenue laws, will be much less for the coming year than during either of the two preceding years. If less than one-twentieth of our present revenue is obtained from customs and the balance from income and profits tax and internal revenue, and our expenditures exceed the enormous amount annually collected during the war, it becomes apparent that with the reduction in revenue which will be inevitable, because of reduced incomes and profits, the Treasury will be unable to meet appropriations made, and resort must be had to temporary loans or the sale of bonds. It will also be remembered that the eighteenth amendment, and the laws passed pursuant thereto, will reduce to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars the annual revenues of the Government.

I have sought to learn what the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Committee on Finance of the Senate proposed to do in order to obtain revenues to meet the expenses of the Government. No concrete plans have been submitted so far as I am advised. A number of bills have been introduced which seek to increase tariff duties. The dye bill is upon the calendar, but that measure would not increase the revenues if enacted into law. It seeks to establish an embargo, coupled with a licensing system, both of which under the circumstances seem to me to be obnoxious. It has been proposed that we increase the tariff on pearl buttons and tungsten and magnesite.

As I understand this plan there is no intention of obtaining revenues for the Government but of preventing importation, thus giving a monopoly to the domestic producers of the articles mentioned.

The statesmanship of the majority party seems to be wholly incapable of meeting the situation, and we are drifting under intolerable economic and fiscal conditions into a perilous sea. Upon every hand there are multiplying evidences of inadequate production in those things essential for the welfare and life of the people. Some industries exhibit a small increased production, but as I recall not a quantitative increase but rather an increase in values, which results from various causes not necessary for me to discuss at this time. Absurd and uneconomic plans are suggested to meet the serious financial and industrial situation confronting our country, but no sound and practicable measure is submitted and no action taken or recommended by the party in control of legislation.

The fallacy is encouraged that the Government by its mere fiat, or by entering into business, or by employing more people, or by making larger appropriations can heal all industrial and economic wounds. The thought does not occur to the advocates of these nostrums and vagaries that their realization would still further impair the health of the patient. The sovereign remedies required are more work, more production, more industrial activity, greater thrift, the most rigid economy in private and in public life, and the investment of the savings and accumulations of the people, thus resulting in more homes and business houses and factories and enterprises and productive forces. There is no reason why there should not be continued and increased prosperity. We have the raw materials not only sufficient for our own needs but to supply many of the nations of the world. Our resources are inexhaustible, and capital has not been seriously, if at all, impaired by the ravages of war. Our man power measures up to the highest standards, and the genius, ability, and high character of the American people give them a preeminence over all other nations and our country a primacy to which no other nation can aspire. While other nations are burdened with debts and Europe is in chaos and ruin we are prepared for every emergency and competent to meet every storm.

Notwithstanding the large sums received from taxation, the United States is now indebted in the sum of $26,000,000,000. The annual interest upon this amount is approximately $950,000,000. A large sum will also be required for sinking-fund purposes. These amounts are to be added to the ordinary expenses of the Government, and unless there is immediate retrenchment the amount we will be called upon to raise by Federal taxation will range between four and six billions of dollars annually for an indefinite period. This is too great a burden to place upon the American people; and every public official who has to do with public revenues and public expenditures must set his face against every form of extravagance and resist the importunities and pleas for Federal aid in behalf of multitudinous matters to which the attention of Congress has been called. I am led to inquire how the United States is to obtain sufficient funds to meet the legitimate and ordinary expenses of the Government during the coming years. It is clear the prewar sources of revenue will prove inadequate, and the present system of taxation must be perpetuated or some other method of raising revenues devised. We can not hope to raise from customs but a small part of our annual needs. Indeed, if the purposes of leaders of the majority party in Congress, as reported by the press, are to control, the amount received from customs will bear a smaller proportion to the total revenues derived in the future than it does at the present time.

The Republican Party has never exhibited any partiality for a system of direct taxation, and it is safe to predict that it will follow its past and present predilections. There is some opposition to the Federal Government employing the inheritance tax as a means of revenue. Some States regard that as a proper and exclusive field for State taxation and have objected to Federal invasion of that source. In my opinion the Federal Government will continue this method of taxation.

Criticisms have been offered by a limited number to the continuance of the income tax. Notwithstanding the fact that for nearly a century the power of the Federal Government to impose income taxes was scarcely questioned, its authority was finally denied by the Supreme Court; but a constitutional amendment opened this source of revenue to the General Government. It will remain as a part of the permanent system of taxation. No political party would dare to announce opposition to a policy which regarded personal and corporate incomes as a source of revenue.

The income tax has yielded a considerable portion of the revenue of Great Britain. For hundreds of years incomes were taxed in the United Kingdom, although there are some who have believed that the system was originated by Pitt. A report by the Commissioner of Inland Revenue in 1885 referred to the land tax of 1692, and states that it was in fact a property and income tax, and that personal estate was quite as much the object of charge as land. The elder Pitt, speaking of the proposal to raise the "income tax to 7d. in the pound," declared that it would cause a revolution. He knew the difficulties to be encountered in enforcing a system of direct taxation, and like many other statesmen he often sought the easier way; that is, the indirect system of taxation, though in its application it bore more oppressively upon the poor. He stated:

> You can get the money by an easier method. By the method of indirect taxation you can tax the last rag off a man's back, the last mouthful of food from his mouth, and he won't know what is injuring him; he may grumble about hard times, but he will not know that the hard times have been produced by taxation.

We can readily believe that many of the revenue acts following the Civil War were in line with the philosophy of the elder Pitt. There has always been opposition to a just system of direct taxation. The owners of property have violently opposed the enactment of laws which sought to meet the expenditures of governments by a system of direct taxation and have urged indirect taxes on consumption. Autocratic and imperial governments have sought to exempt the rich and the property class from the burdens which ought to have been laid upon them. We may learn valuable lessons concerning fiscal policies and taxation by reading the history of France for a hundred years prior to the French Revolution. And the democratic upheavals in the Italian cities and towns are replete with lessons from which we may derive benefit even in this day. Whenever the democratic forces have broken down the ramparts of autocracy and absolutism they have attempted to remove taxes from the necessaries of life and to impose a direct system of taxation. When there was a subsidence of the democratic wave in Italy the octri and indirect taxes again were imposed upon the people.

Alexander Hamilton introduced a system of indirect taxation and made it a part of the internal fiscal system of our Nation. There was opposition to this system, and a Representative speaking in Congress in 1790 said:

> The time will come when the poor man will not be able to wash his shirt without paying a tax.

Many political economists take the view that indirect taxes are taxes on labor. Of course, there are some objections to an income tax, and it results in some injustices; but there are so many irrefragable reasons in its behalf and so much of justice and equity in the system that by common consent it will remain a part of the revenue system of the Government.

In its application some have contended that certain classes and interests have not borne their fair share of taxation, while others have been oppressively dealt with. For instance, it is stated that the farms of Wisconsin in 1910 paid but 3.86 per cent of the income tax levied by the State, while the manufacturing interests paid 20.39 per cent and the merchants and bankers paid 27.23 per cent. I am unable to state the relative value of the agriculture interests and the property owned by the manufacturers, merchants, and bankers. However, the income tax does not rest upon the value of the property owned by the taxpayers, and I believe that in the employment of this plan of obtaining revenue better and fairer methods will be adopted, so that any just ground for complaint will in time disappear.

The present excess-profits tax yielded for the 19 months, beginning April 6, 1917, and ending October 31, 1919, $6,700,000,000. It will be observed that this amount is considerably more than one-half of the entire revenue of the United States during that period. There are many complaints against this method of deriving revenue. During the war there could be no just ground of objection to this plan of taxation. With the return of peace, it may well be that material changes should be made in the provisions of existing revenue acts.

I am directing attention to the various sources of taxation for the purpose of showing the difficulties that will be encountered in raising sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government unless there shall be adopted a policy of strictest economy. The American people will not willingly submit to these enormous taxes. They will demand reductions, and reductions can not be made unless economies are practiced. I appeal to Senators against the wild and unnecessary appropriations which are receiving legislative approval. I protest against some of the pension bills that are being enacted and the socialistic demands that are being gratified.

Unless the American people from their annual income and production save sufficient for capital investments there will be interruption in all lines of business development. We must not only have capital for domestic investments—and capital will only come from savings—but if we would continue our foreign commerce there must be capital available for foreign investments. By that I mean we must be in a position to sell products and take in payment therefor stocks, securities, or other forms of property which foreign purchasers may have available. Our surplus products will thus find markets and be converted into capital investments to the benefit and profit of all. For many years the United States was a debtor nation. Holland, Great Britain, France, and Germany invested hundreds of millions of dollars in the United States. Their capital aided in the construction of railroads, manufacturing plants, smelters, and the development of our mines. Tens of millions annually were received as dividends and profits from these American business enterprises, and a portion at least were in turn converted into capital investments in our own country.

European nations are now unable to purchase our raw or finished products to the extent of their needs. They would gladly increase their purchases, but they have no means of payment. They can not pay with gold or commodities because of their impoverished condition. We may be compelled, if we would have their trade and find markets for our surplus products, to make capital investments in other lands.

Our future prosperity and economic and industrial development will be determined by production and thrift. Production will put us in the way of saving and accumulating, and thus capital will be created, and it must constantly be produced to avoid economic decay. It would be well if we remember the wise words of Adam Smith:

> Man is generally considered by statesmen and projectors as the materials of a sort of a political mechanics. Projectors disturb nature in the course of her operations on human affairs, and it requires no more than to leave her alone and give her fair play in the pursuit of her ends that she may establish her own designs. * * * Little else is required to carry a State to the highest degree of affluence from the lowest barbarism but peace, easy taxes, and a tolerable administration of justice, all the rest being brought about by the natural course of things.

In framing revenue legislation to meet governmental needs there must be no retrogression and no reactionary policies. A forward-looking system must be devised, not one which hedges about wealth and presses more heavily upon the toilers of the land, but one which rests upon equity and finds support in the principles which make for social justice. These other words of Adam Smith, written more than 130 years ago, must not be forgotten:

> The subjects of every State ought to contribute toward the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State.

However, there is some incongruity in this classical statement which has not escaped the criticisms of political economists, but I will not pause to discuss the matter.

I was interested in the suggestion just made by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I am not sure that I fully comprehended the meaning of his statement, but if I interpret him correctly his view is that the Federal Government should impose taxes which would be confiscatory of the property of some individuals. Mr. President, we do not have in the United States, as they have in Great Britain, as pointed out by the Senator, the feudal system, and no entailed estates. The men of wealth in our country, with but few exceptions, have risen from poverty and their accumulations are the result of their own unaided efforts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator entirely misunderstood me if he thinks I advocated the confiscation by the Government of the property of the individual who happens to be rich. I spoke of large landed estates which men continue to withhold from use. What I meant was this, and I advocated it publicly in California a number of years ago in connection with certain railroad grants: Here were large grants comprising millions of acres of land—and there are many individuals who have millions of acres of land—and the terms of the grants were not complied with; the grantees would not sell, or if they did sell they sold at prices far above those provided in the grant. In such cases I advocated a system such as that in force in New Zealand.

The bird that can sing and will not sing ought to be made to sing. If the railroad company would not comply with the terms of the grant in regard to selling the land, either as to the quantity and price, a system of graded taxation might be imposed so that it would be more profitable to sell than to hold. That is the idea I intended to convey awhile ago; I do not advocate confiscation of estates, but where a man or a corporation owns and controls—as the lords and landed proprietors of Great Britain did—immense bodies of land, and charges rack rent and makes no use of his holdings for the public good, then I say that some system of taxation ought to be imposed to meet pension or other appropriations that will compel the disposition of such estates in an equitable, just, and fair way. I did not mean to intimate that I favored the confiscation of property.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that where land grants have been made subject to the conditions to which he refers they should be enforced. It is quite likely there have been too many land grants by the States, as well as by the Federal Government, and I have no doubt some grantees have failed to meet legislative requirements. The States have the power to deal with unused real estate and large areas of territory which are held for purely speculative purposes. Of course taxes must be uniform and equal. But uniformity has reference rather to class than other conditions. I have no doubt that the States will in a just and proper way reach conditions which retard legitimate and proper development of the Commonwealths and bear oppressively and unjustly upon the people.

I have sometimes felt that there should be liberal exemptions from taxation with respect to homes. We should be a nation of home builders and home owners. The family hearthstone will soon be as extinct as the dodo. With the advent of hotels and apartment houses we are losing much of the beauty and power and glory that come from the home.

I have made these observations, Mr. President, with respect to expenditures and taxation, with a view to awakening, if possible, not only here but throughout the country, an interest in the action of Congress with respect to appropriations. If it were possible to arouse any public sentiment for national economy, for a policy restricting appropriations to purely governmental purposes, I should feel that an important step forward had been taken and that a national reform was imminent. But I confess to a belief that no such reform is imminent—that we will go on expending billions with insufficient regard to the terms of the appropriations made and with an entire disregard of the inhibitions, expressed or implied, placed upon the Federal Government.

The bill before us is for a very large sum. We have paid out in Civil War pensions more than five and one-half billions of dollars. Our appropriations for the coming year for Civil War pensions will be nearly $300,000,000. In 1870 they were but twenty-nine million. In 1880 they exceeded fifty-six millions. Our pension budget for the coming year, including vocational training, rehabilitation, insurance, and so forth, will exceed $600,000,000. In 1889 the Civil War pensions were almost eighty-nine millions, and in 1890 one hundred and six millions were appropriated. In 1892 the aggregate was in excess of one hundred and thirty-nine millions; in 1893, one hundred and fifty-seven millions; in 1895 the appropriation amounted to almost one hundred and forty millions; and in 1897 that vast sum was reached. In 1898 there was a total of one hundred and forty-four millions, and for each year following until 1907 the amount was substantially one hundred and forty millions. In 1908 the amount reached one hundred and fifty-three millions, and 1909 called for one hundred and sixty-one millions; 1910 substantially one hundred and sixty millions were appropriated; in 1911 one hundred and fifty-seven millions; in 1912 one hundred and fifty-three millions; in 1914 the total was one hundred and seventy-two millions; in 1915 more than one hundred and sixty-five millions; in 1916 one hundred and fifty-nine millions; in 1917 one hundred and sixty millions; in 1918 almost one hundred and eighty millions; and in 1919 the stupendous sum of $222,159,292 was paid out to the beneficiaries under Civil War pension acts.

In these figures, with the exception of 1919, I have stated the amounts in round numbers. Between March 4, 1861, and June 30, 1919, there were numerous general laws passed providing for pensions, and in addition there were more than 56,000 special acts granting pensions to those whose names appeared upon the rolls of the military or naval branches of the Government during the Civil War or to their representatives.

There are now before us four omnibus pension bills carrying large amounts. They are calendar Nos. 227, 228, 229, 230. I do not know the purpose of the chairman of the committee, but presume he will press them for consideration and passage.

Let me briefly refer to a few provisions of these omnibus bills to show the character of pensions for which special pension acts are being passed. No. 178 grants a pension to the widow of a deserter. No. 140 gives a pension to a woman who has been married twice since the death of her ex-soldier husband. No. 533 grants a pension to the daughter of an ex-soldier who died in 1868. She is already enjoying a pension, but this provides an increase. No. 189 indicates that the beneficiary served less than 90 days as a substitute. He is to receive a pension, though a Federal law prohibits mere service pensions for those whose names were upon the rolls for less than 90 days. Another paragraph calls for an increase in the pension already paid to the son of a deceased soldier. No. 1038 increases the pension of a woman who married an old soldier in 1897, and upon his death she married another pensioner in 1913. He died in 1917. Both marriages were nearly 50 years after the war. We are called upon to increase her pension. And there are hundreds of similar cases in these omnibus bills. Calendar No. 227, one of the omnibus bills referred to, contains 112 special pension provisions of this character. The next omnibus bill contains 78 separate claims for pensions. They are not to be distinguished from those which I have just mentioned. Calendar No. 329 carries 121 special pension bills and calendar No. 377 contains 110.

Many of these special bills are unworthy, and to grant pensions in this indiscriminate way is unfair and unjust to the taxpayers of the United States as well as to those who are justly entitled to pensions.

I have stated upon a number of occasions that I was in favor of pensions in behalf of the widows and orphans of men who gave their lives for their country, and that I would heartily support pensions for those who were wounded or who incurred disabilities while in the service of their country.

I believe in disability pensions, but this mad policy of service pensions for everyone does not commend itself to my judgment. We have repudiated the invalid-pension plan which was adopted and which met the approval of the American people. We have yielded to organized demands, to political pressure, and to influences not always free from selfishness, so that we are now fastening upon the country a policy of pensioning everyone whose name appears for a few days upon the military or naval rolls of the United States. In order to obtain pensions it is not necessary that one should be injured or wounded or have incurred any disability, or be incapacitated from manual labor, or be in need of contributions from the Federal Treasury. We are applying the policy that the Federal Government is a dispenser of gifts and bounties and pensions and moneys without reference to the principles of justice and common sense which should underlie Federal action. The Federal Government is the rich Prince Fortunatus; it is a benevolent overlord to whom the people may look for aid and benefactions; it is to nurse and coddle and assume paternal authority and control over individuals, communities, and States.

Upon a former occasion I gave some attention to the provisions of the bill under consideration. I referred to the fact that on the 10th of June, 1918, a general pension act was passed carrying a substantial increase "to all beneficiaries covered by its provisions, and for the continuation of the policy of special pension legislation to meet extreme cases not adequately covered by the general laws." The report accompanying this bill states that in the hearings preceding its enactment the officers of the Grand Army of the Republic stated that if legislation were passed "no further call would be made upon the generosity of the Government for soldiers or their widows and dependents." They, of course, embodied the demands of those who were seeking pensions, as does the bill before us. The promises then made are now disregarded, and the same forces which secured the passage of the act of June 10, 1918, will secure the passage of this bill. The report accompanying this measure states:

> This bill proposes to increase the pensions of all the veterans of the Civil War to $50 per month regardless of length of service, and to increase the pensions of widows from $25 to $30 per month.

It is not required that the person to receive the pension shall have been wounded or shall have suffered any disability or shall now be in any manner disabled; nor is it required that he shall be in need of a pension. The door is thrown wide open, and the invalid-pension policy is discarded and thrown into the scrap heap and the service-pension plan riveted upon the country. The committee report declares that "it is no answer to any arguments that it adds $65,000,000 to the burdens of an already overtaxed country. We are overtaxed to-day because of the continuance of extravagant expenditures initiated during the war, and which so far we have scarcely made serious efforts to curtail."

The report further states that prior to the war our annual expenses were less than $1,000,000,000, whereas "to-day, nearly two years after the war, we are calling and providing for more than $5,000,000,000 yearly to meet the running expenses of the Government in time of peace." This report was written and signed by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is chairman of the Committee on Pensions and one of the leading members of the Committee on Finance of the Senate. It is condemnatory of the extravagance of this Congress, and if consistency were to control the committee it would be opposing instead of supporting the bill now before us.

My attention has been called to a number of articles by Mr. Burton J. Hendrick, appearing in the World's Work a few years ago. He discusses the pension system at considerable length and points out the evils which have characterized its administration and the evolution by which the invalid-pension plan is being superseded by one which grants pensions for only a few days of military or naval service. His presentation is a strong indictment of some of the legislation which Congress has enacted and the abuses which have attended the administration of pension legislation. In the course of his discussion he states:

From 1861 to 1890 a military or naval pension in the United States signified one thing, and one thing only. It was a payment made as part compensation for injury received or disease contracted in the service of one's country. It was not a reward for patriotic deeds—such service naturally has no financial equivalent—or national charity doled out to a soldier in his old age. For those wounded in battle, however, or disabled by disease or physical infirmities, the Nation has always acknowledged a certain financial responsibility. Such men had lost, to a greater or a less extent, the ability to support themselves; it was the Nation's duty to assist in such support; it was no humiliation for the soldier to accept it; he had certainly given a real consideration for value received. Until June 27, 1890, that was the fundamental idea underlying the American pension system. That is the idea which has governed all systems of military pensions. It is the principle regulating the present-day pension schemes of most European countries and of the South American Republics.

Even on this basis, however, our pension list gave occasion for enormous abuses. These abuses did not arise from the fundamental nature of the pension system, which was not necessarily evil, but from the liberality, carelessness, and criminality with which it was applied. In 1866, one year after the Civil War, we were paying something more than $15,000,000 to its survivors. In 15 years this had grown to $56,000,000. In nine years more—1899—it had jumped to $86,000,000. In 1872 Pension Commissioner Baker, appointed by President Grant, said, referring to the large expenditure for that year—$30,000,000: "We have reached the apex of the mountain." This statement clearly reflected the opinion of his day. In the minds of most people there was no reason why the pension list, after the first period of five or six years succeeding the Civil War, should increase, the pension system remaining as it was. That system, as already explained, pensioned only invalids, men wounded or otherwise physically disabled in service from the years of 1861 to 1865. At the close of the war most soldiers actually wounded clearly understood that fact; a missing arm or leg is a palpable misfortune. Most soldiers injured by disease seriously enough to incapacitate them for manual labor also clearly realized their condition. Men of this type and their dependents—widows, minors, mothers, fathers, orphan brothers, and orphan sisters—were then our only legal pensioners. Nearly all, therefore, in the natural order of things, should have gone upon the pension rolls in the few years immediately succeeding the war. A certain proportion, in comfortable circumstances or having conscientious scruples against pension, would not apply or delayed their applications until want forced them to take this naturally repugnant step; but the great mass of honest pensioners ought to have gone upon the rolls fairly quickly. That is what Commissioner Baker meant in 1872 when he said that "we have reached the apex of the mountain." The fact that the pension list in the next 18 years increased threefold, with no fundamental change in our pension system, shows that there was something wrong somewhere.

The explanation involves one of the most humiliating chapters in American history. The English historian, Lecky, in his "Democracy and Liberty," criticizes the democratic idea mainly because, under this system of government, the tendency is always for one section of society to rob the others. He instances the American system of military pensions as a case in point. Whatever one may think of Lecky's general criticism, this particular illustration is an apt one. The history of the Civil War pensions is simply a story of a small minority laying violent hands upon the Federal Treasury. For 40 years Congress has practically abdicated its control over pension legislation.

The author refers to the "new professional characters, the pension attorney and the pension doctor," who scoured the country for pension candidates "to discover some niche in the pension laws that would admit the most undeserving." Advertisements were published and methods of a most reprehensible character employed to secure pensions from the Government.

Mr. Hendrick then proceeds:

The whole system was an invitation to fraud. With all possible precautions the taxpayers would have been swindled out of millions every year, but Uncle Sam made no attempt to safeguard himself. The proceedings on which pensions were granted were all ex parte.

One has only to read the reports of certain high-minded pension commissioners—such as Bentley, 1876–1881; Lochren, 1893–1896; and Henry Clay Evans, 1897–1902, all ex-Union soldiers, whose feelings as bona fide veterans were outraged by the infamous crimes constantly perpetrated in the name of patriotism—to understand that these frauds existed on a gigantic scale. Occasionally they became so notorious they got into the criminal courts.

It is a very sordid page which the author presents to our view, but he states that instead of discouraging Congress legislation was enacted which encouraged the perpetration of these frauds. He refers to the mass of laws enacted between 1862 and 1890 and characterizes the regulations as being indefensible. He refers to the law legitimatizing "broomstick" marriages and their issue, to the act of 1888 providing for all widows' pensions whenever granted as dating from the date of the husband's death. The "arrearage" bill, as it was called, and the "broomstick" marriage law, Mr. Hendrick says, "enormously increased the business of the fraudulent claim agent." And in the same category he places the act of 1879 granting "arrearages" to all invalid pensioners. The latter law increased the pension expenditures from thirty-three millions in 1874 to seventy-five millions in 1880 and ultimately involved an expenditure of $200,000,000. A new principle, Mr. Hendrick states, was introduced in 1890 under which every person whose name appeared upon the rolls who was incapacitated for manual labor from causes not due to his own vicious habits obtained a pensionable status. The wealth of the recipient of the pension was immaterial and it was also unimportant that he had large property from which he derived an annual income of thousands of dollars or that he was receiving large sums from professional or other services not calling for manual labor. In three years under the operation of this act the pension expenditures increased to $157,000,000 and the pension rolls reached nearly a million names. Laws were passed which made "heroes out of deserters" and "bounty jumpers" and made them beneficiaries of Federal appropriations. Mr. Hendrick gives many illustrations of the abuses resulting from pension legislation and the inexcusable character of some of the legislation enacted.

When he wrote his articles the chapter was not complete. Since then we have passed general pension bills and thousands of special pension acts, and with the passage of the one under consideration we will have increased the annual appropriations for Civil War pensions to nearly $300,000,000.

In his concluding article Mr. Hendrick indicates that the record of pension legislation has been so unsavory that we can "prevent its repetition." He directs attention to the fact that there are between four hundred and five hundred thousand persons whose names appeared upon the rolls during the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection, and that organizations are being effected and "further political methods are being adopted in an effort to create another huge pension roll." He then declares, "This thing the present generation can and must stop."

The author was not familiar with present-day conditions or he would not have indulged in this language. There is a bill before us which has passed the House which relates to those who were connected with the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection, and which contains provisions for pensions not dissimilar to those found in the legislation which the author so vigorously condemns. Of course, that bill will pass whether meritorious or not, as all bills will providing pensions.

Prof. William H. Glasson has discussed in his book called Federal Military Pensions in the United States the pension laws, and has submitted in a candid manner facts concerning pension legislation, and has revealed conditions connected with such legislation and its administration, that will bring a spirit of depression and profound regret to many Americans. Prof. David Kinley, the editor of the volume referred to, declares that "the moral degeneration caused in time by the changing view of the true character of pensions led also to the evil of extending them to men whose service was brief and resulted in no injury to them." He states that "pensions were taken without compunction by some men who, while technically entitled to them, had other means of support, and, indeed, were sometimes rich; to say nothing of young widows of old soldiers. For such people to take pensions is to throw a shadow of graft on the whole system."

The editor's preface arraigns in striking manner our pension system, and he declares that under it and as a result of it party leaders and parties formed their platforms and policies to suit the influences and organizations behind this legislation, and that "the Public Treasury became, in the minds of many, a proper source of loot."

Mr. President, liberal pensions should be paid to the deserving, but the policy of pensions which is being suggested by many, extending as it does not only to mere service pensions in the military and naval branches of the Government, but into many activities of the people whether they relate to Government or to private or corporate service, all to be paid by the General Government, is in contravention of the letter and spirit of cur Constitution and is promoted by the socialistic movement which is active and persistent in our midst.

It can not be disguised that legislation, both State and National, is being sought in harmony with the development of socialistic policies; and there has been Federal and State legislation that has tended to divert the minds of the people from a proper conception of individualism, and a true appreciation of the importance of the development of those virtues which contribute to character and individual strength, which, after all, must persist if there shall be a government of the people. The persistent demands for Federal intervention and paternalistic control in private matters and State concerns are indicative of the centralizing trend in our political affairs.

With Louis XIV the thought was that he was the State and the source of power.

It has been a long and painful struggle to establish a representative democracy, to get rid of the conception of State authority and power, and to place upon the people the crown of authority.

Under the old view the individual was wholly unimportant; his personality merged in the State from which was supposed to flow the streams of justice or mercy or prosperity that vitalized the arid wastes and deserts of human existence. The State among many peoples in ancient times was regarded as omnipotent and the ruler as the incarnation of authority and power. The life of the individual merged in the supposed superior rights of the State. Political tyranny was associated with economic tyranny. It is true, however, that in the Old Testament there was emphasized the view of individual responsibility and development, but withal the desire, the welfare of society, and the establishment of justice and righteousness in the social organism was ever present and controlling.

Christianity came to exalt the individual, to place him upon sunlit peaks, not in the shadows of darkened valleys. Under this divine faith man became the child of God and heir to His mercy and goodness and blessings. The valley became exalted and the mountains of power and arrogance and privilege and monopoly were cast down, and henceforth the world was to take on new life. Justice and freedom, political and moral, were to guide humanity. The swarming millions were the children of one Father. The peacemaker, the meek, the oppressed, were to be lifted up. Slaves felt that their chains were stricken from their limbs and that they were to become links in the great chain of life and constitute a part of the social structure. There was added to individual life a new dignity, and the humblest and the poorest felt that he was part of the vital and omnipotent power which controlled not only men and nations but the universe itself and that there was that within him, immortal and indestructible, which could not be lost in a social pantheism or in a divine immanence which denied personal and individual immortality. It were well if there were carried into the social and political problems of the people the true meaning and spirit of the Christian faith.

The Declaration of Independence was a clarion call for individualism, for individual freedom, for individual responsibility and development and progress. We can not repeat too often those words that should be a challenge in the ages to come:

> All men are created free and equal, and they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

There was wrought into the framework of this Republic that conception of individual responsibility. There was a recognition of individuals as the source of authority and of power. States and social organisms received their authority from the individual. Their grants were from the people. Jefferson's words of fire, which burned into the hearts of all, have guided the forces of liberty and democracy unto this day. His prophetic voice was raised against tyranny and oppression in every department of life. Freedom and liberty and the expansion and growth of the human soul were the themes which inspired this great teacher, whose name will be revered so long as free government endures.

Individualism is not selfishness, nor does it seek any inglorious isolation or any distinctive individual supremacy. Those ends are just what true individualism is not. Democracy conceives the units and individuals to be living, dynamic forces which may not achieve full perfection or worthily wear the crown of individual greatness and success and honor unless in conjunction with successes and achievements upon the part of others. The lone peak that lifts its head above the plains does not arrest the clouds and bring the gentle rains to moisten the thirsty soil. But successive peaks side by side gather the moisture from the passing clouds and all combine to bring joy to earth and happiness and prosperity to man.

But it is impossible for individuals and groups of individuals, as well as nations, no matter how high their purposes or how perfect their chart and compass, to always steer a course free from obliquity and danger. Life is a struggle, and progress and increased perfection come only after contests and trials. Political and economic heresies have destroyed nations which were breasting the mountain tops from which they might look out upon the promised land of freedom. And this great Nation, born of heroic struggles and glorious victories, and pointing nations toward the heights of justice and liberty, has been beset by dangers and encompassed by foes. From the beginning there have been influences at work seeking to change our form of government and to lead the people into lines of thought destructive of those principles and of their very spiritual and moral attributes. Toryism and the forces of retrogression have from time to time fought furiously for supremacy. The apostles of a destructive socialism and wild and visionary schemes for industrial and economic revolutions have dogged our Nation and invaded the homes and sought to poison the minds of the people. Predatory forces at various times have attempted to seize the reins of authority and power and to use the Government for private ends and to obtain personal and corporate privileges.

I have upon a number of occasions called attention to the sinister forces which, following the Civil War, endeavored to fasten a policy upon the Nation which struck at individualism and the principles of equality and justice which must persist if this Republic shall endure. By legislation favors and special privileges were sought and often obtained.

When the powers of the State or the General Government were prostituted to aid corporations or individuals, there was introduced deadly poison into our body politic, the eradication of which was impossible and the evil effects of which persist for an indefinite period. And it is paradoxical that the same forces which sought to utilize the Government for corporate advantage and special privilege should be among the first to cry aloud against evils of State socialism and the destruction of that perfected and splendid individualism which maintains liberty and is a sure fountain of justice and progress.

During the World War dislocations occurred in the lives of individuals, as well as in the policies and systems of governments. Unrest and instability appear everywhere, and disorder and often chaos threaten individuals, communities, and States. The lives of individuals have been changed, and the activities of communities and States modified. A different outlook upon life and upon the economic and social and political problems is presented to many. We have become so accustomed to the overthrow of nations and the destruction of thrones and the ruins of political and industrial systems that many persons have assumed that cataclysmic changes are to be continued. The idea of a return to a period of rest and orderly progress and slow and labored growth in the political or social body is regarded with dismay; it seems too monotonous. All sorts of pseudo-philosophies find followers. Visionaries and dreamers, extremists and charlatans, sincere reformers and subtle Machiavellian schemers appear throughout the disordered and distracted nations, and with seductive whisperings and tumultuous cries contribute to the instability and hysteria and distress which even at this hour sweep round the world. There are needed throughout the world influences that will still the tempest and quiet the raging waters, and bring faith and hope and peace to the hearts of men. Now more than ever the qualities of courage and steadfastness of purpose and devotion to the great truths which the past has established are required. This is an hour for self-examination, for close analysis of our hearts, for that calm and profound introspection which must always obtain among thinking people. Out of this welter will come order; and strong nations founded upon law and social justice, by the very force of their example and their moral qualities, will influence disorganized forces and guide refractory peoples into paths of progress and peace. It is a lesson which the world is learning that there are moral ties which bind humanity, and spiritual forces which rivet nations and peoples together.

There is need in our own land for a recurrence to first principles. The smoke of battles must be cleared from our eyes, and our ears must be closed to the martial strains of war, and with unselfishness and that spirit of patriotic sacrifice which should inspire and guide us all we should determine whether we have departed from the faith.

Defenders of the Constitution of our Government and of our institutional life are needed now as they were needed in the days of Webster or of Lincoln. This must still be a people's government, a democratic government, a government wherein the crown of power and authority rests upon the people. The old landmarks must be preserved. Our Nation is so constructed as to not only permit but require progress and development. In the language of Gov. Coolidge, it should be as "progressive as science and as reactionary as the multiplication table." It is not founded upon fleeting and ephemeral principles. Some of the false teachers in the land can not conceive of progress or of growth except through revolutionary and destructive changes. Change is not always progress. It is often a precursor of or the result of death. The highest form of progress is orderly, serene, tranquil.

Many changes are insisted upon which are destructive of the very theory upon which this Government rests. There are those in our midst who are insisting upon the nationalization of industries and the erection of a socialistic State that would reverse the wheels of progress and profoundly change this Republic. Socialism is a denial of the natural rights of man, and indeed of the noble appeals of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. Grunlund and other socialist writers have declared in substance that philosophical socialism is a repudiation of the theory of natural rights. Their theory is—

> It is society, organized society, the State, that gives us all the rights we have. * * * As against the State, the organized society, even labor does not give us a particle of title to what our hands and brain produce.

This view, of course, is destructive of individualism and those sources of power and progress which have found expression in the lives and achievements of the American people. Manifestly the State can confer no rights or grants of power; its power is such as the people granted to it, and where it goes beyond such grants its acts are tyrannous and often oppressive. There has been a constant struggle in organized States between those who have supported the State in its usurpations and efforts to abrogate rights and institute privilege and those who sought to assert and maintain individual rights and restrain Government to its legitimate and proper functions.

Mr. Hirsch has stated in his Democracy versus Socialism his conception of the meaning of socialism:

> Socialism is an empiric system of organization of social life, based on certain ethical and economic conceptions. Its ethical conceptions consist, generally, of the denial of individual natural rights and the assertion of the omnipotence of the State; especially of the denial of the right of the individual to the possession of the products of his labor, and the assertion of the right of the State to the possession of the products of the labor of all individuals.
> Its economic conceptions are that competition and private property in land and capital and the consequent exaction of rent, interest, and profit—that is, surplus value—by private persons are social evils responsible for the material and mental destitution of vast masses of the people.

He further states that its industrial, distributive, and political proposals based on this conception are the abolition of private property and private control of the instruments of production, land, transportation, trade, loan capital, and public debts. Private ownership and management by the community acting through the State are to be substituted for private rights. Its political proposals involve the extension of the power and function of local governmental bodies and international control of international production and trade.

It is to be noted that in the international congresses of socialists the program discussed looks to the destruction of most nationalistic formulas and the breaching, if not the demolition, of all laws relating to the preservation of nationality and to the ultimate union in one international group of the peoples of different nations.

Because there have appeared political and economic evils in our Government, encouragement has been given to the socialists who are advocating revolutionary economic changes, and their diatribes and appeals have been accorded more serious consideration than otherwise would have been given them.

Legislation enacted by States, as well as by the Federal Government, reveals that some progress has been made by the advocates of State socialism. It can not be denied that there are persons giving support to both the great national political parties who are seeking to mold these political organizations into practicers if not preachers of a paternalism which will eventuate in an exaggerated form of State socialism.

Many of the colleges of our land are filled with teachers of socialism and are sending from their doors advocates of policies, economic and political, which are utterly at variance with the political philosophy upon which this Government is based. Measures are presented for consideration in the Federal Congress which can not be defended upon any formulæ known to this Republic, but which find their support in the hysterical preachments of neurotic people or the socialistic creed of Karl Marx, with more or less of dilution.

It may be true that when a ship is being driven before the winds it may not steer a straight course, and expediency may require, in the face of political and economic storms, some slight departure from a rigid and inflexible course. But danger, if not disaster, attends the renunciation of principles and policies resting upon safe foundations. More than ever is there necessity for devotion to those principles of individualism which will produce such striking and beneficent results. There is no hope or promise of better conditions or amelioration from world-wide distractions by precipitating an economic or political revolution in our land. The virile qualities of the American people have brought us to the proud position of world eminence which we occupy. There would be no alleviation of conditions by State control of private enterprise or the assumption by the State of a charitable and philanthropic attitude toward the people. The Government is not an eleemosynary institution; it does not exist to furnish employment to the people, to grant bounties or pensions for their support and maintenance.

Let me quote the words of President Wilson, found in chapter 11 of his New Freedom:

> I do not want to live under a philanthropy. I do not want to be taken care of by the Government, either directly or by any instruments through which the Government is acting. I want only to have right and justice prevail, so far as I am concerned. Give me right and justice and I will undertake to take care of myself. If you enthrone the trusts as the means of the development of this country, under the supervision of the Government, then I shall pray the old Spanish proverb, "God save me from my friends, and I'll take care of my enemies," because I want to be saved from these friends.

There is true Americanism in these words of Mr. Wilson, quoted from another chapter of the same work:

> For my part, I want the pigmy to have a chance to come out. And I foresee a time when the pigmies will be so much more athletic, so much more astute, so much more active than the giants that it will be a case of "Jack, the giant killer." Just let some of the youngsters I know have a chance and they'll give these gentlemen points. Lend them a little money. They can't get any now. See to it that when they have got a local market they can't be squeezed out of it. Give them a chance to capture that market and then see them capture another one, and another one, until these men who are carrying an intolerable load of artificial securities find that they have got to get down to hardpan to keep their football at all. I am willing to let Jack come into the field with the giant, and if Jack has the brains that some Jacks that I know in America have, then I should like to see the giant get the better of him, with the load that he, the giant, has to carry—the load of water. For I'll undertake to put a water-logged giant out of business any time, if you will give me a fair field and as much credit as I am entitled to, and let the law do what from time immemorial law has been expected to do—see fair play.

And these words from chapter 11 of the same volume should be received with acclaim by Americans at this hour:

> The reason that America was set up was that she might be different from all the nations of the world is this: That the strong could not put the weak to the wall; that the strong could not prevent the weak from entering the race. America stands for opportunity. America stands for a free field and no favor. America stands for a Government responsive to the interests of all. And until America recovers those ideals in practice she will not have the right to hold her head high again amidst the nations as she used to hold it.

I referred a few moments ago to Max Hirsch and quoted a paragraph from his work entitled "Democracy versus Socialism." He expresses in such a clear manner what individualism means and what its achievements are, I desire to quote further from his work:

> Individualism, affirming the existence of equal, natural, individual rights, seeks the further evolution of society in the direction of its past evolution until society shall have become fully subservient to the welfare of the individuals composing it, seeking to attain such general welfare through the removal of the remaining infractions of the natural and equal rights of all individuals, "the freedom of each to exercise all his faculties as he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other"; the right of each to the fullest opportunities for the exercise of his faculties, limited only by the equal right of all others; and the unlimited right of each to benefit by his own beneficial acts, reward being proportioned to service rendered.

The attacks made upon our Government are not always frontal, but nevertheless they are aimed at the weakening of the foundations of the Republic and the substitution of some other political and economic order. Papers and magazines of influence and philanthropists and preachers of power and reputation for piety, noble women actuated by altruistic purposes, and men of fine sentimentality, in their desire to better conditions of humanity are daily giving support to measures which increase governmental authority and power and limit individual rights or State power. Some of their plans would involve the paralysis of individual initiative, or, at least, encourage efforts for governmental favors and bureaucratic activity. Those characteristics which have been so preeminent among the American people and have led to such inspiring results are either uprooted or atrophied by these constant attempts upon the part of men and women of the highest purpose. As a result we find men and women shirking responsibilities which shape character and which must be discharged if local government is maintained.

The idea is too often inculcated that legislation supplies remedies for all governmental ills. Work and thrift and self-reliance and the fine qualities which the pre-Revolutionary fathers so strongly exemplified are regarded as evidences of a provincialism not compatible with the cosmopolitan traits of the American people. Legislation is regarded as the "cure-all" for lack of family discipline, imperfect educational systems, laxity in moral standards, intellectual ineptitude, social and financial inequalities, inefficiency in industrial activity, unproductiveness of human labor or of natural resources, and religious lethargy and spiritual devitalization. Indeed, statutes are to be the sovereign remedies for the multitude of imperfections and inequalities and errors and evils which now in a greater or less degree manifest themselves among the people.

There would be humor in these distracting appeals were it not for the tragic consequences which they may entail.

State socialism is not new. Marxian philosophy, which is controlling Russia to-day, has found supporters in many ages of the world. But wherever its principles have been applied its consequences have been disastrous. Progress has been checked and there has been a crystallization of society upon a lower plane or a disintegration of its constituent parts resulting in demoralization and ruin. Men can not be coddled and nursed into the kingdom of righteousness, nor be made worthy to be placed at the table of the just and the good. Character is a plant of slow growth and develops and becomes productive through a variety of processes, including trials and vicissitudes. Exotic plants may show temporary beauty and glory. The enduring forms in most struggles for life and liberty come up through tribulation and are subjected to many acid tests.

Dr. David Jayne Hill correctly appraises the results of the imposition of a new bondage which State socialism would be under the name of freedom:

> If the State were, in fact, a wise, beneficent, and provident entity, capable of exercising a truly parental care in protecting the interests and preserving the liberty of the people, the only considerable evil resulting from its unlimited authority would be the weakening of the individual through his complete reliance upon his benevolent guardian and the consequent suppression of personal initiative, effort, and responsibility. But, in truth, the State possesses none of these characteristics. It is, in reality, merely a sum of legalized relations, in whose name and by whose authority certain definite persons, called the government, control the activities of the community.

Sir Henry Maine speaks of evolution from status to contract, but there are efforts both reactionary and radical to destroy the right of contract and return society to a collodial state. State socialism is destructive of proper evolutionary forces which must ever operate in the biological as well as in the social organism. But the unit of evolution is the individual, and the differentiations exhibited in him cut the steps in the steep mountain side which lead individuals, groups, and nations to higher levels. They constitute—

> * * * The rungs by which men climb;
> Those glittering steps; those milestones upon time;
> Those tombstones of dead selves; those hours of birth.

Dr. Nicolai, in his book called "The Biology of War," has stated that it is immaterial how we formulate our morality, that the important thing is to determine and understand that man is an individual unit and at the same time a part of a superordinate organism. "Whoever knows this and realizes it, not merely as a truth which can be acquired but as a living law in him and a feeling, is a human being indeed and in truth." In striking sentences he shows the results of individuality and the necessity of its development:

> Virtue can be taught, but only through self-knowledge. This settles the subjective aspect of the matter, for there is no virtue which is identical for all. Every virtue, like everything else, is dependent upon the individuality of the one. But this subjectivism has its limitations. There is an objective and general principle of virtue that plainly proclaims that it is impossible for a virtue or even a characteristic to develop if the rudiment of it is not present in us. Out of this natural impossibility grows a positive demand. All men should recognize as clearly as possible the powers and potentialities that lie within them and develop them to their highest perfection. The individual man should consider how or by what means he can accomplish a maximum achievement and best serve mankind. * * * The modern Socratic theory of evolution does not require a man to remain permanently in the place where a rational or irrational destiny has placed him; it desires a man to seek out his place in the world in such a way that it will have meant progress to him.

Wherever there are limitations upon individual action they should be tested by the proposition whether or not they are necessary for the preservation of equal rights and freedom for all. We should never forget the words of Jefferson:

> Who has destroyed the liberty and rights of men in every government which has ever existed under the sun? The generalizing and concentrating of all activities and powers into one body, no matter whether the autocrats of Russia or France or Austria or of the Venetian Senate.

And a paternalistic government, developing into a socialistic state, is as great an autocrat as any of the Governments alluded to by Jefferson. The government of Lenin and Trotski, fashioned along the lines of Marxian socialism, is as tyrannical and destructive of liberty as any the world has ever produced. The individual is as unimportant as the servile slave who toiled on the banks of the Nile to erect pyramids or colossal temples to commemorate the reigns of despots. State socialism which may be conceived in benevolence functions only as an autocratic power, and succeeds, if it succeeds at all, when it brings into inanimate and protoplasmic mass those who submit to its system and become slaves to the ambitions and tyrannies of the autocratic few.

I have referred to the fundamental concepts of Christianity as supporting the view of individualistic development. Science points the way to the same course. Without accepting all the implications which have been drawn by many from the writings of Darwin and Haeckel, I think there is sufficient proof to support the view that there is a tendency of individuals to vary in all directions within certain limitations, and that there is a transmission of such variations in a greater or less degree. The principle of natural selection does have application in the development of man. Any social organism which prohibited or limited these differentiations in mental and physical traits manifestly would be inimical to individual progress.

The intellectual achievements of the nidividual, whether viewed as the manifestation of the principles of evolutionary development or not, are contributing factors to the ultimate advancement of the community or State life. And so we measure social progress and the political liberty of the State by the heights gained by the individuals therein.

Students of sociology find in the progress of society, if not the application of the principles of biological development in their entirety, at least analogies which are striking and furnish irresistible deductions that the most advanced social condition—and by that I mean the one in which there is the greatest happiness and moral progress—is found in those communities in which the fullest and freest opportunity has been afforded for the development of those individual and personal characteristics which in the aggregate constitute character.

Uniformity is the tendency of applied socialism. What is desired is not mere diletantism but the rich fruits that individual differentiation secures. The rivalries that are attended with full and free opportunity restrained only by just and lawful means, now as in the past, will give the truest liberty and the highest form of civilization. The moral impulses of the people, that altruism which rises to higher levels with the passing years, will mitigate the sharpness of individual contests and rivalries and hold in check predatory instincts, and with the application of the moral and religious truths of the Christian faith man more and more will feel increased responsibilities and will regard himself as a trustee and no longer will exclaim, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

If the nation be regarded as a moral organism with maximum duties as to the enlarging and directive sphere of its activities, there should nevertheless be a minimum of coercive functions to the very lowest terms. Indeed, the "essence of morality is spontaneity," not conduct which is the result of force. Many of the devotees of State socialism decline to perceive that in its operations there is compulsion and a maximum of directive power, even when the members of the State have become so enemic and atrophied as to no longer function as entities and are reduced to that stagnant monotony which responds to no mental stimuli and is moved forward or backward only by compulsive forces. The struggle for individualism is nothing more or less than the contest for greater participation in all the activities and processes of life.

Let me call attention again to the fact that ours is a Government which derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. Not a forced consent, not a mass consent, but the consent of the units, the individuals of the State. The great revolution in England was in defense of those personal rights which, with modification of language but with slight variation in meaning, are expressed in the first 10 amendments to the Constitution of the United States. Congress shall make no law that interferes with the personal rights of the individual. His right to freedom of speech and freedom of thought, to freedom of religious belief—these and other personal and individual rights constitute the bulwark of American liberty. Imperfect economic or industrial conditions must not be made the pretext for iconoclastic assaults upon the principles of free government. Social justice and political and civil liberty are attainable under the provisions of the Constitution. The socialism of Marx and Engel and Lenin and Trotski leads to destruction and death.

The Coal Miners and Operators Are Not Profiteers. The High Price of Coal is Due to the Lack of Transportation. We Have Ample Coal, Mines, and Miners to More than Supply the Needs of the Nation if an Adequate Supply of Cars is Furnished. Without Cars the Nation Faces a Serious Situation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. ROBSION,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted I do not feel it would be out of place to give to the Congress and the country some information relative to the coal mining and transportation situation. There has been much said by the press and the public outside of the coal-mining sections, charging both the operators and miners with profiteering. I have given some considerable study and thought to the coal-mining situation. I am more especially familiar with the bituminous coal industry in southeastern Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia. I know that these charges are untrue. Most persons to sustain their charge of profiteering cite Mr. McAdoo's report on corporate earnings printed as Senate Document No. 59. Perhaps no public document was ever more unfair or misleading. Mr. McAdoo admits that he selected only the coal companies "which in 1917 earned 15 per cent and more on their capital stock." In 1917 there were more than 7,000 separate coal producers. His so-called report only includes 392. There were only 392 out of more than 7,000 coal operators whose earnings were 15 per cent or more. There were about 7,000 whose earnings were either nothing or less than 15 per cent. The earnings of the 392 are based on the capital stock. Many of these companies had much more invested in their business than was represented by the capital stock, some of them three times as much or more. We can see that Mr. McAdoo's so-called report is so erroneous, unfair, and misleading as to be of little value in reaching a sound conclusion. I am convinced he issued it for political reasons.

UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY MAKES A REPORT.

The United States Geological Survey report on coal production for 1917, page 958, shows that the total output of bituminous coal was sold by the operators at an average price of $2.26 per ton at the mines. Of course, out of this sum all expenses and taxes had to be paid.

During the year of 1918 the coal prices were under the control of the Government. On November 19, 1919, Dr. Garfield, United States Fuel Administrator, stated publicly that the average price allowed the bituminous operators for 1918 was only $2.61 per ton. He stated that this permitted an average "margin" of 46 cents per ton; but Dr. Garfield claimed that out of this 46 cents per ton Federal taxes of 30 cents per ton and State, county, and municipal taxes had to be paid. We can see this left a very small margin of profit. The United States Bituminous Coal Commission reported that some 1,551 companies examined by them produced about one-third of the soft coal of the country, that 337 of these lost money, and the average profit of the other 1,200 or more was less than 11 per cent.

The Federal Trade Commission has recently issued two reports on cost and selling prices of bituminous coal, showing that the operators' profits for January and February, 1920, were only about half the amount of profits which were made in the same months in 1918 under Government control.

CONDITIONS HAVE GROWN WORSE.

The United States Fuel Administration's engineers, after making a very careful survey of the coal-mining industry, made a report in which they declare that a 50 per cent car supply will increase the cost of production of coal 40.5 per cent, and a 40 per cent car supply will increase the cost of production nearly 55 per cent. For instance, if the cost of production with a good car supply was $2.80 per ton, the cost of production with a 40 per cent car supply would be $4.34 per ton.

The car supply in eastern Kentucky for the nine months beginning August 2, 1919, and ending May 2, 1920, would not average more than 40 per cent. For months efforts were made to run the mines, not counting the strike of more than a month last fall. With this condition of the car supply, the cost of production, not counting the increase of wages and the increased cost of supplies for these nine months, would be nearly 55 per cent. After careful investigation I have come to the conclusion that more than one-third of the coal mines in eastern Kentucky have lost money every month since January 1, 1920, and the principal cause of this loss was a shortage of the car supply.

Few persons living outside of the coal-mining region realize the heavy overhead expense of a mine for the days it is idle. Great quantities of water must be removed, falling slate must be taken care of, and other work must be carried on just the same when the mines are idle as when the mines are in operation.

Again, few people realize the tremendous hazards undertaken by persons who invest their money in the development of coal mines. No one can see inside of the hill or mountain. Frequently great sums of money are expended in opening up a coal mine, and it turns out to be a mere "pocket" of coal. The vein may be thick and workable near the surface and run out. Sometimes there is a fine showing of coal on the outside, and when the vein is explored into the mountain or hill, you run into a mountain of rock, and the seam of coal disappears. Fires break out in the mine, the hill or mountain falls in, and there are other hazards that enter into the coal-mining business. There are more "drawbacks" and "flarebacks" in the mining industry than nearly any other business. There is an old adage among the mining people, "When prices are good and orders are plentiful cars are scarce, and when cars are plentiful prices are low and orders are scarce."

CARS, CARS, AND MORE CARS.

It is true that the price of coal has advanced materially, but the price of a great deal of the materials and equipment has advanced nearly 500 per cent, and because of the increased cost of living, wages have greatly advanced, but the thing chiefly responsible for the increased cost of coal is shortage of the car supply.

Attorney General Palmer is reported in the press as threatening to prosecute the coal operators and coal miners for profiteering. There is no agreement or understanding between the coal operators and the miners to increase the price of coal. It has been claimed throughout the country that the miners and coal operators do not want a good car supply, but that they want a shortage of coal cars in order to boost wages and the price of coal. This charge is absolutely without foundation.

Ever since last August I have been working in conjunction with representatives of the miners and coal operators of Kentucky and Tennessee in an effort to secure more cars. These representatives of the miners and operators have made many trips to Washington and elsewhere in an effort to secure more cars. These efforts have not been spasmodic, but have been daily and constant for more than nine months, but we have met with failure and disappointment. The car supply to-day is rotten, and the coal industry throughout my section is demoralized because of this condition. If Mr. Palmer would push the railroads, and they will furnish the cars, the price of coal will drop in a short time to normal, but if present conditions of transportation continue coal prices will go higher. I might add, however, that the coal operators do not receive more than about half of what the consumer pays for coal. It is true that the freight rates are high, but I am satisfied that the middlemen, the men that have very little invested and are subject to very little hazards, are the fellows who are making the big profits in coal. The miners and operators are not making the big money. When the war broke out nearly every operator in eastern Kentucky was deeply in debt. Many of them had been losing money for years, and many others had been forced into bankruptcy.

THE RAILROADS MUST FUNCTION.

Private control of railroads is on trial. The failure to furnish transportation is causing widespread dissatisfaction, and unless the railroads of the country give better service there will be a clamor for a change. Both miners and operators in my section are greatly disappointed because of the lack of service since the railroads were returned to their owners. It is fair to say, however, that the Government during the period of Government control did not keep up the rolling stock. The tonnage of the country has greatly increased and the railroad facilities of the country have been diminished. We do not have the motive power and the cars in the country to handle the business. We might also add that the switchmen's strike over the country has had a great deal to do with the shortage of cars. It is believed in some quarters that the railroad owners are themselves contributing to this condition in order to obtain more favorable legislation. I do not believe Congress will give any further grants to the railroads, and if they do not function the people will insist upon a change. I warn the railroad owners of the country to respond to the needs of the Nation, and if they fail the responsibility will be largely upon their heads. If the Nation is to be furnished with coal and the price is to be within reach of the people, the railroads must furnish an adequate supply of cars to the mines. A good car supply will solve the fuel problem of the Nation.

THE LIFE OF THE MINER IS FULL OF HARDSHIPS.

Some fellows sitting in big newspaper offices writing long articles denouncing the miner as a profiteer do not know what they are talking about. I hear a great many high-salaried clerks and officials here in Washington abusing the miner and charging him with being a profiteer. They would not know a coal mine if they should see one. Many of them sit on soft chairs with steam heat in the wintertime and electric fans in the summer time, receive from $10 to $20 per day for every work day in the year, and their average time is less than six hours per day for each work day of the year. It fills me with indignation to hear men like that denouncing the miner as a profiteer.

A large part of the population of this country know absolutely nothing about mines or the hardships of the miner. Under the new wage scale, as I understand it, the mine laborer on the outside receives from $4 to $5.60 per day, and the laborer on the inside of the mine receives $4.56 to $5.60 per day. Most of the coal is dug and loaded by the ton. They receive from 77 cents to 88½ cents per ton for digging and loading the coal. The working conditions in a mine at the very best are very disagreeable. The bottom or floor of the mine in most instances is wet, covered with mud or water. Most coal ranges from 25 to 45 inches in thickness. The miner generally must work on his knees or lie down in this mud and water to dig and load the coal into small cars. Most of these cars hold about a ton. He must push this car of coal from his room to the entry, where it is taken from the mine with horse power or electrical power. The air inside of the mine is more or less impure. Your life is always in peril from overhanging loose slate and rock. No miner knows what hour the roof may fall in and maim or kill him. It is, indeed, a hard and dangerous life. How many of these fellows who are denouncing the miner would be willing to go into this dangerous place and double up in this small space or lie down in the mud and water and dig and shovel coal all day for even $10 or $20 per day, and have regular work? But, as I have shown, the miners in my section for the last 9 or 10 months have not averaged more than about 40 per cent time. That is about two and one-half days to the week. Suppose a man receives the $5.60, the maximum per day, for three days per week. This only amounts to $16.80 per week. He must pay rent and feed and clothe his family for seven days on this sum. We can readily see that he must content himself with the bare necessities of life. Very few food products are produced in the mining regions. Nearly all of the food products must be shipped in. Prices are higher than they are at most places. Most miners have big families. How could they get along on less than $17 per week? But many of them receive much less.

A great many people have denounced the miners for demanding a six-hour day and a five-day week. As I understand this matter, the miners are demanding that the operators guarantee them 6 hours per day and 5 days per week; in other words, 30 hours of work per week. For the last 9 months or more they have been receiving about 20 hours of work per week. They say they can not live on 20 hours of work per week, and they must have 30 hours of work per week in order to support themselves and their families. They can not make a living for themselves and their families under the present prices with 2 or 3 days' work per week. The miners are entitled to a living out of their work for themselves and their families. They must have a living. If they do not get cars and can not put in good time, the price of coal must go up, and the country must suffer for fuel. I can not impress upon the Members of this House and the country too strongly the importance of having an adequate car supply to take care of the coal industry of the country. So, after all, the fuel problem is a transportation problem. There is plenty of coal, plenty of coal mines, and plenty of coal miners to produce more coal than is necessary to take care of the Nation and all of our export trade if we only had the transportation.

If the Attorney General, the big editors of the country, and certain elements of the public would study this problem, they would cease to denounce the miners and the operators as profiteers. Both undergo more hazards, and the miners undergo more hardships, than nearly any other industry or class of men, and receive less profits than any other class. I want to see the miners of this country receive a square deal at the hands of the American public.

The Sixty-sixth Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY U. HARDY,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, cussing Congress has been an American pastime privilege for about 131 years. It has been practiced in and out of season by those in and out of power and by all classes of people most of the time.

People pray to God for all manner of blessings they never expect to get and go on praising God for His infinite wisdom.

People appeal to Congress for any and all kinds of physical and moral relief and against all kinds of physical and moral regulation and Congress is cussed because every wish that is wished can not be granted.

It is fortunate for many of us that God does not grant every prayer. And it is fortunate for the country that Congress does not grant every petition. It could not do it; there are so many conflicting petitions.

If Congress were run by one man, and you or I were that man, perhaps we could get done just what you or I would like to have done. But our Congress is not run by one man. In some countries the Congress does reflect the wishes or orders of the one man. But those countries have been having distressing times recently.

Our Congress represents the composite thought of 110,000,000 people. The House with 435 Members and the Senate with 96 Members reflect and represent the people to whom they are directly responsible. They are elected to represent not only their districts but to serve, as best they can, the whole United States. These Senators and Representatives come from every section of the country—some from thousands of miles apart. Most westerners have seen the East, but many easterners have never seen the West and know little of it.

Each Member comes down to Washington full of the thoughts and ambitions of his constituency. He soon finds that there are 435 districts in the United States of America and each Member has more or less of a program. The thoughts, aspirations, and programs of the Members may differ about as much as the altitudes or weather of their respective districts.

These programs take the form of bills, are introduced, and are referred to committees. The committee asks for information and reports from the appropriate departments and holds hearings on the bills. A bill must stand the searchlight of rigid investigation from many sources before it gets out in the House or Senate. Then it must run the gantlet in the House and the Senate, and no matter how innocent a bill may appear on its face, the chances are that some knowing Member from another section will point out blemishes or birthmarks that damn it in the minds of many, or some parliamentarian may choke it to death in the early stages of delivery. If the bill comes through safely, it may be so defaced and reformed by committee amendments or House or Senate amendments that its proud father would not recognize it in its own cradle.

Members realize the impossibility of always having their own way, and they know that practically all legislation is in the interests of the whole 110,000,000 people. Members know that legislation must be brought about by conference and compromise—by giving in a little here and there and taking what they can get, and that on the whole the wisdom of the many is better than the dictation of the few.

Back home the individual is apt to think that his views ought to be adopted by the Nation without amendment; hence his disposition to cuss Congress for its failure. But it is good-natured and not vicious and only an American prerogative, not countenanced under some forms of government.

Withal, the American Congress has gone on all these years doing business at the old stand—doing the best it could under all circumstances—and has really given us a pretty good government. In all the world there is no better example of a free parliamentary body, nor one that is more representative of the people and more responsive to the will of the people.

The Sixty-sixth Congress may not have accomplished all that any one citizen would like to have had done, but it has a great program of constructive work to its credit.

It is an easy matter to plunge either the family or the Nation into debt. It is a difficult matter to call a halt on family or national extravagances and rearrange family or national expenditure to a reduction of income.

To this end the Congress directed its first attention. War-time appropriations were necessarily great and expenditures were made with a lavish hand.

The total appropriations by all the Congresses, from Revolutionary days down to 1917, were $25,600,000,000. The total appropriations of our war-time Congresses, from 1917 to 1920, were $47,668,000,000.

Appropriations are made largely on the recommendations of the different departments of the Government. These estimates and demands are brought in, considered by the committees and two branches of Congress, and met as nearly as possible or as nearly as seems absolutely necessary.

During the 20 years preceding this war the estimates of the departments were cut down $500,000,000 by the House—a rather large sum. But it is dimmed into insignificance when compared with the accomplishment of the present Congress.

When this Congress met in May, 1919, it found that several of the appropriation bills had failed of passage in the former Democratic Congress. For these bills the departments had estimated $4,514,151,326 necessary. The Democratic House had passed bills amounting to $3,767,975,974.73. The new Republican Congress got out its pruning knife and cut the appropriations to $2,828,283,432.76.

Thus the country was saved, on these first bills alone, $1,685,867,893.64 from what the administration asked for, and $939,692,541.97 from what the former Democratic House had appropriated.

Similar big sums were cut from the estimates coming up on the regular appropriation bills at the second session. It is hard for a governmental function to reduce its own activities or estimates. The departments all want to extend rather than reduce. Somebody must go in with the ax, and this Congress has used the ax freely.

The administrative departments estimated their needs at $6,334,312,929.46.

This Congress appropriated for these items $4,859,890,327.80.

So, on the regular appropriation bills, the Republican Congress saved the people the magnificent sum of $1,474,422,692.16.

If this Congress had no more to its credit than the saving of money—the cutting down of extravagances in governmental affairs—it would be a notable Congress in the country's history.

But there is another story worth telling.

The West has big interests and few Representatives in the House. The 11 Western States have representation as follows: Colorado, 4; New Mexico, 1; Arizona, 1; Utah, 2; Nevada, 1; California, 11; Wyoming, 1; Idaho, 2; Montana, 2; Washington, 5; Oregon, 3; having altogether only 33 Members. The State of New York alone has 43 Members and Pennsylvania has 36. So it can be seen that the West does not dominate the House. But it has taken care of itself fairly well. Fortunately, the leader of the majority comes from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and is of large influence in the House, both because of large ability and long service. Wyoming has been wise in retaining his services in Congress over many years. Many States have lost much by changing Representatives frequently. No new Member can cut much of a figure in any legislative body. In no such body does long service count for so much as in the Congress.

From the standpoint of pork-barrel bills for the West, there is nothing to brag about. This has been a porkless Congress, thanks to those in control.

But some of the big measures passed have been of special interest to the West. I might mention among these:

The railroad legislation.
The oil-leasing act.
The water-power act.
Reclamation acts.

THE RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

When the Congress voted to turn the railroads back to private ownership a sigh of relief went up from the land. That Government operation had been an expensive failure was apparent to all. Some of the railroad employees opposed the move and still advocate Government ownership of one form or another. Some railroad employees give credit to Government operation for big wages. But even all the railroad employees do not advocate Government ownership, and many are smart enough to appreciate the fact that war times and not Government control are responsible for present salaries.

The great majority of the people who are not interested in railroad stocks or railroad jobs are strongly opposed to the nationalization of industry. The vote in the Congress fairly represented the people of the country, I believe, and many who voted against this bill are bitter opponents of Government ownership and voted against this particular bill for other reasons. The vote in the House was: For, 249; against, 150; in the Senate: For, 47; against 17.

The West is interested in this subject perhaps more than other sections. The West has been built up and developed along the lines of the railroads. These roads would probably never have been built under Government ownership. The initiative of private industry has always been more enterprising and bold in its undertaking than governmental functions. The future of the West is undoubtedly brighter under private enterprise than under governmental control. The blighting effect of Government dictation and bureaucratic control over the resources and enterprises of the West has been felt in many quarters.

The railroad legislation may not be perfect. It was the best bill that could be gotten through at this session. It is not permanent law and can be amended at the will of the people through Congress.

The legislation is too big a subject to discuss here in full, but I want to quote Senator CUMMINS on one of the most criticized subjects—the alleged guaranty.

In a recent address, explaining the new railroad law, Senator ALBERT B. CUMMINS, of Iowa, demonstrated the urgent need of the legislation and disproved some misrepresentations concerning it. He showed that farmers and other shippers have suffered great loss, due to inadequacy of railroad equipment, and that the railroads are without funds to purchase cars and engines. He explained that the new law authorizes short-time loans of $300,000,000, but that additional funds will be necessary, which must be raised by other means.

"To accomplish this end," said Senator CUMMINS, "the law establishes a rule of rate making for the guidance of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to continue during a period of two years. The rule directs the commission to adjust rates of transportation so that they will, as nearly as practicable, yield an income equal to 5½ per cent of the value of the railroad property as determined by the commission. This does not mean that each railroad will earn a net income equal to 5½ per cent. Under such a basis some of them will earn 2 per cent, some 4 per cent, some 6 per cent, some 8 per cent, a few more than 8, and a few less than 2. And in order to guard against excessive incomes any railroad earning in any year more than 6 per cent upon the value of its property must pay one-half of the excess above 6 per cent to the Government, creating a fund from which the commission may make loans to railroad companies upon proper security for the purpose of purchasing the equipment and facilities of which the country is in such dire need.

"Ignorance and malice have conspired to misrepresent this part of the law. The people are being told that Congress has guaranteed a return of 5½ per cent to the railroads, including all their watered stock. This statement is wickedly false. The provision is not a guaranty in any sense. It creates no obligation upon the part of the Government, and not one penny can ever be paid under it from the Treasury. Furthermore, it is not a guaranty, because, in fixing rates, the commission must estimate the volume of the traffic for the ensuing year, and that estimate may, of course, be above or below the traffic actually moved. Moreover, the commission must estimate the cost of maintenance and operation for a future period, and it is manifest that this can not be reduced to a certainty.

"The Constitution forbids rates which will yield, taken the country over, less than a fair return; and in these days it will not be insisted by any fair-minded man that 5½ per cent is an excessive return. Nor does the provision permit the commission to consider water and worthless stocks and bonds, or stocks and bonds of any kind. The commission is to consider only the real value of the railroad property actually used in the service of transportation. The basis of 5½ per cent is a temporary measure to meet an acknowledged emergency.

"It has been said by some superficial or malicious critics that under this provision railroad companies can expend recklessly and unnecessarily large sums for maintenance and operation. There is not the least foundation for this criticism. The act specifically provides that the commission must take into account honest, efficient, and economical management of existing transportation facilities, and further it gives the commission authority to make rules controlling expenditures for maintenance. The Railroad Labor Board adjudicates disputes respecting wages. So the public is protected at every point."

THE OIL-LEASING BILL.

The people of what are commonly known as the public-land States have always been opposed to what has been called the leasing or permit system as applied to the resources of the West lying within such States. Some five or six years ago, however, those who were best advised came to the conclusion that the thickly populated States in which there were no public lands, having the preponderance of the vote in both Houses of Congress, were determined to force upon the people of the West such a system, and that unless the West accepted such system their resources would continue to be, as they had been since about 1909 or 1910, tied up by withdrawal orders removing from exploitation and development great areas in practically all of the Western States.

To gain relief from this situation the representatives of the public-land States in Congress and many agencies outside of Congress endeavored to have passed what has been commonly called the oil-leasing bill covering the coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium lands on the public domain. Democratic Congresses struggled with the question for at least six years without being able to write upon the statute books any law which would permit of the development of such lands. It is to the credit of the present Congress that at last such a bill has been passed and become a part of the law of the land, and under its provisions there will be afforded an opportunity to develop the resources of the West which has been practically denied for a number of years past.

The bill, while not being all that the West could wish or all to which it is entitled, is more liberal in its terms than the one which failed in the last Congress and should bring about an orderly development of our resources, which will be for the benefit of the whole country, and at the same time will place in the reclamation fund and in the treasuries of the various States in which the lands developed are situated a fair proportion of the money arising from the royalties which are to be paid.

THE WATER-POWER BILL.

Practically the same situation which has existed on the lands above referred to has applied to the great water powers of the Western States in reference to their development, and with this subject Congress has been struggling for the last six or seven years. This Congress has now passed and the President has signed a comprehensive bill authorizing the development of all of the water powers of the country under a commission composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, and while this bill is more restrictive than it should be, it also is a better bill, from the standpoint of the West, than the one which failed in the last Congress, though it also fails to give the West that liberal treatment of its resources which was extended to all of the older States in passing title from the Government to private ownership of Federal lands lying within their borders.

The importance of this water-power bill to the West can readily be realized when it is stated that the United States Geological Survey estimates that there is in excess of 44,000,000 horsepower, or 71 per cent of the total potential available horsepower in the United States, to be found within the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Utah, and Nevada, and that of this vast amount but 1,622,021 horsepower, or 3.68 per cent, has been developed and is now being utilized.

The several reclamation projects under way have been well taken care of.

The civil-service retirement law will enable old men in the Government service to be retired, to the mutual benefit of themselves and the Government.

IMPORTANT BILLS VETOED.

The country has been working for a budget system for many years. This Congress passed a very complete budget bill, which was vetoed by the President.

The country is anxious to get on a peace-time basis and get away from the war-time laws. So the Congress passed a resolution declaring a termination of a state of war. The President vetoed this resolution.

The Congress passed a joint resolution repealing all war laws with the exception of the Lever Food Control Act and the trading-with-the-enemy act, but the President vetoed this act.

MANY INTRODUCED—FEW PASSED.

It may interest gentlemen of the House as well as the public to know that there were introduced in the House during this Congress 14,460 bills and 381 joint resolutions, and in the Senate 4,511 bills and 210 joint resolutions.

There were passed and enacted into laws 279 public acts, 72 private acts, and 52 joint resolutions.

OF A PERSONAL NATURE.

This is my first term. New Members do not run the House. I have not tried to upset the customs nor change the rules nor overburden the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have been busy and have enjoyed my work. I was highly honored in being put on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, one of the large exclusive committees. Having served as postmaster at Canon City, Colo., and being a publisher, I find that many of the problems coming before this committee are familiar to me.

I appreciate the friendships made in the House and Senate and the many courtesies shown me by the many Members.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to conclude these remarks by inserting a story told of a part of my work as seen by a Washington correspondent.

A CONGRESSMAN AT WORK.

[By Louis Ludlow, Washington correspondent, in Pueblo Chieftain.]

The duties of a Congressman have grown greatly in the past few years. Ten years ago Congress was not in session more than half the time, perhaps less. During the past four years it has been in session most all of the time, and Members feel that in future years they will have little time to enjoy back home, where their honors are most appreciated.

Besides requiring a Member now to spend most of his time in Washington, the work to be done by the Member has grown greatly since the World War began.

A Congressman now has practically two jobs to work at, either one of which would keep an active man pretty busy all of the time. The House meets in session every day in the week. It takes no week-end recess and observes few holidays. It meets at 12 o'clock noon and runs until 5 or 6 o'clock, and sometimes later. Committee meetings occur in the morning and at nights. To keep up with legislative matters would keep any man pretty busy.

The office work has grown with the war. If a Congressman did nothing more than look after the many things that come to him from the district, he would have long hours and plenty to do. With the committee work and the sessions to attend, a Member must do the office and departmental work in between times and at night. There are many lights burning in the House Office Building every night.

A hundred letters would be a pretty big day's mail in any business house back home. But I saw 200 letters on Congressman GUY U. HARDY's desk last Monday morning. When he left the mail, the mail carrier said: "I leave more letters in this office than in any other office on the floor." The secretary told me that Mr. HARDY seldom gets less than 100 letters a day and often more.

A Congressman's letters are on every conceivable subject. A few relate to legislation. Some are requests for bulletins and garden seeds. From the Western States many relate to public-land office matters, and a Colorado Representative is a frequent caller at the General Land Office, looking after the interests of his constituents. All Members get many letters from ex-service men and all are anxious to give all assistance possible to these patriots.

As a Washington correspondent for one of the great western dailies, I have covered the House Office Building for several years. I have seen Members come and go, and I have observed the work grow until, as has been suggested, it has become a two-man job.

GUY U. HARDY, though a new Member, has set a pace for many of the olders Members in performing service for the ex-service men and their families. The most of his 100 or more letters a day relate to their affairs. He has a large district with many isolated points. The boys in small towns and in the country have not the advantage of a recruiting station or a Red Cross establishment to drop in for information and help. So they write to HARDY, their Congressman, and he looks after their business like a father. The Lord only knows how they have found out so generally that he can help them, but they surely have gotten the information, as his daily mail so fully indicates.

You wonder what they all want. Well, here are a few of the things: Many men want their bonus, many have travel pay to adjust, some officers have lost-baggage claims. Many allotment and allowance claims have been bungled and need adjustment. Some paid for their bonds and never got them. Some want their insurance straightened out or converted and do not know how to go about it. Many have lost their discharge papers and want duplicates. Some need help in getting their compensation adjusted or vocational-training information. Many, in the country especially, need help in getting the uniforms they are entitled to. All are entitled to a service button, which Mr. HARDY gets and sends to all who write him. Many letters come from mothers who need insurance adjustments, to get their young boys out of the service, and now letters are coming in from mothers who want the bodies of their boys brought back from France.

Of course, all of these matters are not necessarily the duties of a Congressman, and many of them could be accomplished without his aid, but many folks do not know how to go at it, and many who do have found out to their delight that Congressman HARDY has been able to do more for them in a week or so than they have been able to do through months of correspondence. Mr. HARDY has simply made a specialty of this work, knows where to go and how to go about it, and he gets results. And he takes as much pleasure in it as if each boy's case was that of his own son.

I suppose every Congressman has had some difficult cases and unusual experiences. Here is one I think is worth telling: The day before Christmas, on my rounds, I dropped in to see HARDY. He was out. His secretary told me he was down trying to get a boy out of jail. That night I heard the story. The day before, a young soldier, a Regular, came over to the House Office Building with a hard-luck story. His chum was in the guardhouse charged with stealing an automobile tire. His chum had served nearly seven years in the Regular Army and was just about to be discharged. In fact, his discharge was made out and was on the general's desk ready to be delivered. The boy had hoped to get out for Christmas. He was a truck driver assigned to Walter Reed Hospital. A few days before Christmas he brought a large tire into the shop, which he said he had found. An officer in another department down town traced the tire to the hospital and had the boy arrested and thrown into the guardhouse. The friend found little luck in getting help until he told somebody that the father of the boy lived in Pueblo, Colo. Then he was passed on to HARDY, who represents the Pueblo district. HARDY used the phone a good deal that night, convinced himself that it was a worthy case, and got a line on the officers who would have to be seen. The next day he spent the whole day driving around the city through a fierce blizzard seeing the people interested. He wound up at Walter Reed with all the charges withdrawn, and convinced the general that the discharge should be signed and delivered before Christmas. It wasn't a case so much of pull or influence as one for diplomacy and human sympathy.

I asked HARDY, "Did the boy steal the tire?" "Oh, I don't know," he replied, "but I don't care if he did; I'd have done the same thing for him if I had had serious doubts about the matter. I think any boy who has served in the American Army for seven years is entitled to the benefit of any doubt and surely deserves to go back into civilian life under the most favorable circumstances."

Congressman HARDY has had between 3,000 and 4,000 cases up for ex-service men, and working up each case requires from 3 to 10 letters and often a visit to one of the departments.

HON. CHAMP CLARK'S ADVICE.

Out of this service has grown real practical experience and an extensive acquaintance with Members of Congress and the various chiefs of bureaus, divisions, and departments, which is not only valuable to my constituency but the source of no little pleasure to me. The experience thus gained is an asset the importance of which was clearly pointed out by ex-Speaker CHAMP CLARK, the great Democratic leader, in an address delivered by him on the subject of "The making of a Representative." At the time he delivered the address in 1916 the ex-Speaker was serving his twenty-second year as a Congressman, and therefore knew whereof he spoke. He said:

"A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

* * * * * * *

"It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has, the quicker he will get up. If he possess these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the 'top-notchers.'

* * * * * * *

"No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country.

"The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man young enough to learn and to grow, with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps him amazingly in doing things. We live in parlous times. Abraham Lincoln's favorite argument for his own re-election was that it is unwise to swap horses in the middle of the river—which applies to Congressmen as well as Presidents.

"I can speak freely on this subject without violating the proprieties, for my constituents have kept me here 22 years, and for 20 years have given me nominations without opposition, for all of which favors I thank them from the bottom of my heart. Their generous action and unwavering friendship have enabled me to devote all my time to the public service. I have not been compelled to spend any portion of my time in 'mending my fences.' My constituents have attended to that. God bless them!"

MEMBERS PAY FOR SPEECHES.

Of course, it is well known to Members, but it may be of interest to the public to know, that speeches sent out by Members of Congress are not furnished free by the Government, but are paid for by the individual Members. The cost at the Government Printing Office is about the same as the cost would be at my own print shop in Colorado. Members spend about $75,000 a year for such speeches printed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS T. McFADDEN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1920, the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a decision in the case of the First National Bank of Canton v. John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, which is of vital interest and incalculable benefit to the national banks of the United States. The character and purpose of the suit are succinctly stated by Mr. Justice McReynolds, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court:

> Appellant, whose place of business is within the middle district of Pennsylvania, brought this suit in the United States District Court for that district, seeking an injunction to prevent John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, from doing certain things under color of his office declared to be threatened, unlawful, arbitrary, and oppressive.
> The bill alleges that, in order to injure complainant's president, toward whom he entertained personal ill will, the comproller determined to destroy its business, and to that end he had maliciously persecuted and oppressed it for three years, in the following ways among others: By often demanding special reports and information beyond the powers conferred upon him by law; by disclosing confidential and official information concerning it to banks, Members of Congress, representatives of the press, and the public generally; by inciting litigation against it and its officers; by publishing and disseminating false statements charging it with unlawful acts and improper conduct and reflecting upon its solvency; and by distributing to depositors, stockholders, and others alarming statements intended to affect its credit, etc. And further that, unless restrained, he would continue these and similar malicious and oppressive practices.

Prior to May 1, 1919, the comptroller's activities toward the bank were such that its reputation and credit were being rapidly undermined and the institution itself placed in imminent peril of destruction. It appeared that unless the protection of the law could be invoked this reputable, prosperous, and growing national bank would be ruined. In this extremity the bank was advised by its counsel that its only salvation lay in the issuance of an injunction by a Federal court. At this moment of extreme peril the bank was confronted by the following dilemma:

As a general rule the Federal court has no jurisdiction over the person of the defendant unless its process be served upon him in the district in which the action is commenced. Since the comptroller is located in Washington, this would have necessitated the commencement of a suit in the District of Columbia, far from the home of the bank, where it and its officers were unknown, involving costly delays due to the distance, the great expense, inconvenience, and extreme difficulty in bringing witnesses and voluminous bank records. Therefore a suit in the District of Columbia would have afforded little, if any, real remedy in such a crisis. Accordingly such a right to an injunction was a mere theoretical protection without practical value. The bank was, however, advised that under the special provisions of the national-bank act a suit might be commenced in its home district in Pennsylvania; that service of process could be made upon the comptroller in the District of Columbia, or wherever else he might be found. Such a suit was accordingly commenced in this manner. The procedure was without precedent. No court had ever clearly held in a similar case that jurisdiction could be thus acquired. The defendant immediately moved to quash this service and to dismiss the bill upon the ground that this service was invalid and that the court therefore never acquired jurisdiction over the defendant. The district court sustained the comptroller's contention; it dismissed the bill; it decided that service of process upon the comptroller in such a case as this was governed by the usual and general provisions of law, and that the provisions of the national-bank act did not authorize a suit of this kind.

But this decision has now been reversed. The Supreme Court of the United States has unequivocally decided that an action to enjoin the comptroller upon the grounds stated in the opinion is permitted and governed by the national-bank act; and that such a suit is properly instituted in the Federal district where the bank is located; and that service of process can properly be made upon the comptroller wherever found. This is the first decision to this effect ever made.

The importance and value of this decision are twofold:

First. The opinion proceeds upon the assumption that if the facts alleged and summarized in the portion of the opinion above quoted are approved upon the trial, an injunction will be granted; whereas up to the present decision it has been universally assumed that the powers of the comptroller are absolute, that his acts are beyond the controlling power of the courts, and that his activities are beyond the reach of the law.

Second. It is now firmly established that in any case wherein a national bank is aggrieved by arbitrary or oppressive action on the part of the comptroller or his agents it may seek an injunction from the Federal judge in its own district where it is located, and it may serve the process upon the comptroller wherever he is found without any difficulty.

There can be no doubt that if a national bank is obliged, as has hitherto been believed, to commence a suit against the comptroller in the District of Columbia only, where the comptroller is located, then the remedy as a practical matter is of no value, because of the inconvenience, delays, and expense incident to litigation in a district far distant from the home of the bank. To compel a national bank far distant from Washington to seek protection in the Washington courts is plainly, in effect, to deny it legal redress. Under the decision of the Supreme Court the protection of the law has been made available to a national bank wherever located, in its own home, where its reputation and that of its officers is known, and where it can seek and obtain its remedies speedily and without unnecessary expense.

The establishment of such a legal remedy will go far to make it unnecessary to avail of it. Its existence will in itself constitute an effective deterrent against arbitrary, oppressive, or unlawful practices.

So much for what has been accomplished. Benefits of at least equal importance to national banks remain to be gained through the trial and final determination of the suit. The Supreme Court has defined a speedy and readily accessible remedy. It remains for the court, upon the trial, to define the wrongs for which the remedy may be invoked. Specifically, it is still to be determined whether or not the comptroller may harass and oppress a national bank through frequent and unnecessary bank examinations or by calling continuously and without good reason for special reports; whether he may enforce the payment of penalties for failure to comply with such calls; whether he may use his office for the purpose of obtaining information for public distribution, with a view to destroying the reputation and credit of the officers of the bank or of the bank itself; whether he may, by arbitrary grouping of legally independent loans, charge that the bank is guilty of making excessive loans, and may demand that such loans be called; whether his agents will be permitted by the character and length of their examinations and their conduct during such examinations to impose unnecessary burdens upon the bank and excite discussion or doubt with respect to its financial condition; whether his bank examiners may open the private papers and packages of customers left with the bank for safe-keeping; whether he or his agents may disclose to competing banks or the public generally confidential information obtained in his official capacity; whether he or his agents may incite litigation against a national bank on the basis of information officially obtained; whether he may compel the production of private books or papers for the purpose of subjecting a bank or its officers to penalties or forfeitures or criminal prosecutions; whether he may cause to be called wherever found the loans of an officer of a bank for the purpose of destroying his credit and that of his bank; whether he may cause to be published in the newspapers or circulated by letter over his signature, reports and statements concerning the bank or its officers reflecting upon the character and reputation of the institution and tending to destroy its credit.

These questions are typical of the many that must be decided in this case. The experience of all national banks during the administration of the present comptroller has demonstrated the fact that nothing can be more important than clearly and precisely to define the limits of power and authority within which the comptroller may properly act. With his powers defined, as they must be in this case, and with a simple and readily accessible remedy provided under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States already rendered, the national banks will know how to protect themselves against oppression and autocratic abuse of power of the character described in the complaint of the First National Bank of Canton, and will have a bulwark of protection and safety which they have never heretofore enjoyed.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert a certified copy of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States as rendered by Mr. Justice McReynolds:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

(No. 618.—October term, 1919.)

First National Bank of Canton, Pennsylvania, appellant, v. John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency. Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania. April 19, 1920.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court.

Appellant, whose place of business is within the middle district of Pennsylvania, brought this suit in the United States district court for that district, seeking an injunction to prevent John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, from doing certain things under color of his office declared to be threatened, unlawful, arbitrary, and oppressive.

The bill alleges that in order to injure complainant's president, toward whom he entertained personal ill will, the comptroller determined to destroy its business, and to that end he had maliciouly persecuted and oppressed it for three years in the following ways, among others: By often demanding special reports and information beyond the powers conferred upon him by law; by disclosing confidential and official information concerning it to banks, Members of Congress, representatives of the press, and the public generally; by inciting litigation against it and its officers; by publishing and disseminating false statements charging it with unlawful acts and improper conduct and reflecting upon its solvency; and by distributing to depositors, stockholders, and others alarming statements intended to affect its credit, etc. And, further, that unless restrained, he would continue these and similar malicious and oppressive practices.

Williams is a citizen of Virginia, officially stationed at Washington. He was not summoned while in the middle district of Pennsylvania, but a subpœna was served upon him in Washington by the United States marshal. Having specially appeared, he successfully challenged the jurisdiction of the court; and the cause is here upon certificate to that effect.

Generally a district court can not acquire jurisdiction over an individual without service of process upon him while in the district for which it is held. But here a national bank seeks to enjoin the comptroller, and the claim is that by statutory direction the proceeding must be had in the district where the association is located and not elsewhere. The court below took the contrary view. (— Fed., —.)

Determination of the matter requires consideration of three sections of the Judicial Code:

"SEC. 24. The district courts shall have original jurisdiction as follows:

* * * * * * *

"Sixteenth. Of all cases commenced by the United States, or by direction of any officer thereof, against any national banking association, and cases for winding up the affairs of any such bank; and of all suits brought by any banking association established in the district for which the court is held, under the provisions of title 'National banks,' Revised Statutes, to enjoin the Comptroller of the Currency, or any receiver acting under his direction, as provided by said title. And all national banking associations established under the laws of the United States shall, for the purposes of all other actions by or against them, real, personal, or mixed, and all suits in equity, be deemed citizens of the States in which they are respectively located.

"SEC. 49. All proceedings by any national banking association to enjoin the Comptroller of the Currency, under the provisions of any law relating to national banking associations, shall be had in the district where such association is located.

"SEC. 51. Except as provided in the five succeeding sections, no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another in any civil action before a district court; and, except as provided in the six succeeding sections, no civil suit shall be brought in any district court against any person by any original process or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant; but where the jurisdiction is founded only on the fact that the action is between citizens of different States suit shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant."

If sections 24 and 49, properly construed, restrict this proceeding to the district where the bank is located, they displace section 51 pro tanto and authorize service of process upon defendant wherever found. (United States v. Congress Construction Co., 222 U. S., 199, 203.)

It is said for appellee that both sections 24 and 49 relate to injunction proceedings brought under the national banking law—such proceedings as are thereby expressly authorized and no others. And, further, that such law only authorizes suit by a bank to enjoin the comptroller when he undertakes to act because of its alleged refusal to redeem circulating notes. (R. S., sec. 5237.)

The act of February 25, 1863, establishing national banks (ch. 58, 12 Stats., 665, 681)—

"SEC. 59. And be it further enacted, That suits, actions, and proceedings by and against any association under this act may be had in any circuit, district, or Territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established."

An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, approved June 3, 1864 (ch. 106, 13 Stats., 99, 116)—

"SEC. 57. And be it further enacted, That suits, actions, and proceedings against any association under this act, may be had in any circuit, district, or Territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established; or in any State, county, or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases: Provided, however, That all proceedings to enjoin the comptroller under this act shall be had in a circuit, district, or Territorial court of the United States, held in the district in which the association is located."

In Kennedy v. Gibson (1869) (8 Wall., 498, 506) this court ruled that section 57 should be construed as if it read, "And be it further enacted, that suits, actions, and proceedings by and against," etc., the words "by and" having been accidentally omitted. "It is not to be supposed that Congress intended to exclude associations from suing in the courts where they can be sued." "Such suits may still be brought by the associations in the courts of the United States." And it further held, "that receivers also may be sued in the courts of the United States by virtue of the act, without reference to the locality of their personal citizenship."

The Revised Statutes—

"SEC. 629. The circuit courts shall have original jurisdiction as follows: * * *

"Tenth. Of all suits by or against any banking association established in the district for which the court is held, under any law providing for national banking associations.

"Eleventh. Of all suits brought by (or against) any banking association established in the district for which the court is held, under the provisions of title 'The national banks,' to enjoin the Comptroller of the Currency, or any receiver acting under his direction, as provided by said title."

"SEC. 736. All proceedings by any national banking association to enjoin the Comptroller of the Currency, under the provisions of any law relating to national banking associations, shall be had in the district where such an association is located."

Parts of the foregoing subsections 10 and 11 were joined in subsection 16, section 24, and section 736 became section 49, Judicial Code.

What constitutes a cause arising "under" the laws of the United States has been often pointed out by this court. One does so arise where an appropriate statement by the plaintiff, unaided by any anticipation or avoidance of defenses, discloses that it really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy respecting the validity, construction, or effect of an act of Congress. If the plaintiff thus asserts a right which will be sustained by one construction of the law, or defeated by another, the case is one arising under that law. (Tennessee v. Union and Planters' Bank, 152 U. S., 454; Boston and Montana Mining Co. v. Montana Ore Purchasing Co., 188 U. S., 632; Devine v. Los Angeles, 202 U. S., 313; Taylor v. Anderson, 234 U. S., 74; Hopkins v. Walker, 244 U. S., 486, 489.) Clearly the plaintiff's bill discloses a case wherein his right to recover turns on the construction and application of the national banking law; and we think the proceeding is one to enjoin the comptroller under provisions of that law within the true intendment of the Judicial Code.

The decree below must be—

The Peace Resolution.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, April 8, 1920.

The House had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war between the Imperial German Government and the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I doubt if there are a dozen men in this Chamber who did not have a feeling of the keenest disappointment when we learned that the treaty had finally failed in the Senate. I doubt if there are a dozen men in the House, on the other hand, who if they had voted in accordance with their own convictions, without the trammel of party or personal dictation, would not have supported many of the reservations which were before the Senate, and perhaps they would have supported all of them.

I doubt if there is any man in this House, I doubt if there is any man in the country, who has considered the question who does not freely recognize that a treaty is the best way to end war, and that consequently a treaty was and is the best way to end this war.

But, gentlemen, the treaty has failed, and the task of patriotic men now is to do the next best thing. We believe that in presenting this resolution we are doing the next best thing.

It seems to me that in any discussion of this question we must consider the responsibility for the failure of the treaty. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] dealt with some of the reasons why the treaty failed. He quoted certain of the recent utterances of the President of the United States that showed his attitude on the treaty reservations, but the issues by the time those utterances were made were pretty well crystallized, the lines were drawn, and it was probably more difficult at that stage for the President or for the other side to recede from their previous position.

I want to read to the House, although it will not be novel to many, the challenge from the White House that first informed the country how the President stood in the treaty issue. The President came before the Senate and presented the treaty in person on the 10th day of last July. About a week after that time he came to the Capitol, and, according to the press reports, had a conference of an hour and three-quarters with Senator HITCHCOCK, the minority leader, representing the administration on this question. Mr. HITCHCOCK was interviewed by the newspaper men immediately after that conference and announced that the treaty must be ratified without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." That sounded the keynote, gentlemen, of the President's campaign, for he was then speaking through the mouth of his recognized spokesman.

Mr. HITCHCOCK continued:

President Wilson, in my opinion, has not changed his position regarding the reservations a particle. My position, which he thoroughly approves, is to insist on ratification without any change either by amendment or reservation.

That was the policy of the President from the moment that the treaty was first officially before the Senate. The consequence we know; the consequence was natural. The gentlemen of the Senate who put party allegiance first stayed to the end in supporting the program of the President.

I desire to read, if you please, a sentence from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 19, during the course of one of the speeches that immediately preceded the final action, the final rejection of the treaty by the Senate. I do not quote the utterance of a Republican Senator. I do not quote the utterance of an insurgent Democrat. I quote from the speech of one of the strong party adherents on the Democratic side of the United States Senate. I quote from the RECORD, page 4596, from the speech of Senator OWEN, of Oklahoma. He said:

I do not believe there is a single Democratic Senator who would not vote for this resolution of ratification if it were not for the belief of such Senators that the President desires them to defeat the resolution of ratification now pending and would regard their failure to do so as a refusal to follow his view as party leader.

That is what Senator OWEN said. In the view of that eminent Senator the result that followed was inevitable, because gentlemen on the Democratic side of the Senate put their party fealty before their duty to the country. I know of no other interpretation to be put on the words of the Senator from Oklahoma.

There is another interesting and somewhat personal side to the present phase of the controversy. I have every respect for a man who opposes a measure because he honestly deems it to be unconstitutional. Every respect is due such a man. But, gentlemen, I ask in all fairness the question whether the minority of this House in opposing this resolution on the alleged ground that it is unconstitutional are entirely candid with the House and sincerely believe that in fact it is unconstitutional?

I will tell you why I ask the question. Some of the gentlemen interested in this resolution put in a good deal of time in its preparation. I am frank to say that for myself I did not find it an easy thing to put the resolution in what I believed to be the best possible form. But before the resolution was finally drafted, before any man in this House or in this country knew in what form it would be taken up on the floor of the House, there was a singular interview, an interview on one side between Secretary of State Colby—and, gentlemen, in view of the recent occurrences I suppose we are fair in assuming that in this important matter the mind of the Secretary of State goes along with that of the President of the United States. [Laughter and applause.] The other party to that interview was the former chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, now the ranking minority member, the first signer of the minority report, Mr. FLOOD. Mr. FLOOD, after the interview with the Secretary of State came back and said, according to the press report, "Mr. Colby was of the decided opinion that the resolution would be unconstitutional." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The resolution was not even drawn then. [Laughter.] We did not know what it would be; we did not know even within fairly elastic limits what its exact phraseology would prove to be. Yet the Secretary of State, going along with the President of the United States, airily says that any resolution is going to be unconstitutional! I ask, I say, in all candor, whether under those circumstances we are not fair in assuming that this case was prejudiced, that they were going to oppose whatever we did just because it was we who did it? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I can not yield. There has been a good deal said about the constitutionality of this measure. I have not time to do more in my few moments than to deal with two or three of the high spots as I see them, but I shall discuss them somewhat fully in my extended remarks. I ask you to look at this constitutional question as a matter of common sense. Common sense is not always good constitutional law and good constitutional law is not always good common sense; but, speaking very generally, the two harmonize and go hand in hand. Is it not good sense to assume that the Constitution of the United States intended that Congress should have the right to end that which it admittedly has begun? Just between man and man and without examining the precedents—which, however, are all the same way—is not that good sense? I submit that it is.

There is one case in our constitutional history that I should like to deal with briefly, although it has been commented on in passing by some of the gentlemen who have preceded me. That is a case which arose in the sixties. During the Civil War another war had broken out to the south of us between Peru and Chile on the one hand and Spain on the other. Hostilities ended in that war in May, 1866, and there was no evidence of an intention on the part of the belligerents on either side ever to resume hostilities. On the other hand, there was no attempt made to conclude the hostilities by an affirmative treaty of peace, and, in fact, the treaty of peace did not follow for a good many years. The Republic of Peru, our Civil War having ended, saw an opportunity to purchase some small war vessels from the United States, and she completed arrangements for the purchase of two monitors which were then in harbor at New Orleans. In 1868 delivery to Peru was apparently imminent on the part of the United States. The Spanish minister to this country protested against the delivery upon the ground that a state of war was still in existence. If the war was ended, it was proper for the United States, of course, to make delivery to Peru, but if the war was not ended it was inadmissible for the United States as a neutral to make such delivery.

When the protest of the Spanish minister came to the State Department it was necessary for our department squarely to consider whether or not peace had come, whether or not the war had come to a close. Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State, and a very able one, found it unnecessary to decide as a fact that at that moment the war had ended, but on the other hand he pointed out that probably it would be his duty to decide the question in the very near future. His language shows how he would be pretty certain to decide when the necessity arose. Here is his language:

The situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences.

There are dozens of cases which I shall include in my remarks substantiating that explicit statement of the Secretary. He went on to say:

What period of suspension is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and it must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances.

It is a question of fact, in other words, whether peace has come or war is still continuing. The chairman of the committee dealt with that question very fully, and I do not need to elaborate, even if I had the time, but on 18 different occasions the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has told us in this very Chamber that the war is ended, and, furthermore, that peace has come. He is the Commander in Chief, and we have a right to rely upon him as to information upon the state of the Union. Can we not honestly and fairly and patriotically pass this resolution in accordance with the facts that he has given us? Can you not, my Democratic friends, get over being rubber stamps for once? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Released Alien Revolutionists Again Arrested.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD with regard to the Bosco alien deportation case and similar cases, including some immigration and deportation statistics.

Mr. GARD. What was the gentleman's request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. About the 1st of April I made a statement here in regard to the alien Bosco, who stood up in court and expressed the hope that the red flag would wave over the flag of the United States. He has now been discharged, as I thought he would be, and I desire to make some brief comment.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Washington what is the name of the man?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Bosco, the alien, who was transported from New Orleans to New York, and has now been released and not deported, and has been dumped on the city of New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How did he come to be released?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. By order of the Assistant Secretary of Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in April I placed in the RECORD a statement concerning Paul Bosco, ordered deported, and who was then being moved from New Orleans to New York, his case being reopened for a new hearing at the request of Attorney Weinberger. The record of this case may be found in the hearings of the House Immigration Committee on communist and anarchist deportation cases.

Bosco, who wildly proclaimed in a Federal court that he wanted the red flag to fly over the Stars and Stripes in the United States, has been set free. To complete the record, I add the following papers from the files in the case:

MAY 27, 1920.

COMMISSIONER GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, D. C.:

There is forwarded herewith record of a further hearing granted Paul Bosco, pursuant to the instructions contained in your letter 54616/242, dated March 29, 1920.

As might have been expected, a reopening of this case served no other purpose than to afford the alien an opportunity to deny, or at any rate attempt to modify, the testimony he gave at his hearing under the warrant of arrest.

It has frequently been held by the courts that an alien's statement during his preliminary hearing, before counsel can have an opportunity to coach him, may be used as the basis for a warrant of deportation, notwithstanding the alien's subsequent denials. The bureau has undoubtedly noted that some decisions go even further and state, in effect, that evidence obtained during such a preliminary hearing is much more likely to be correct than that given after the lawyer appears. Such is the case in this instance.

I have not the least doubt that the sentiments expressed by the alien after his sentence in Parkersburg and reiterated during his hearing before Inspector Thomas V. Kirk at Atlanta last June indicate the true state of the man's mind. I see no reason for modifying the department's previous decision and therefore recommend the alien's deportation. The bureau's file is returned herewith.

BYRON H. UHL,
Acting Commissioner. A. P. J.

JUNE 1, 1920.

From: Assistant Secretary.
To: Commissioner General.
Subject: Paul Bosco.

This alien was arrested (1) as an anarchist, (2) as believing in the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, (3) as believing in (4) and advocating the overthrow by force or violence of all forms of law, and (5) as disbelieving in all organized government.

He was examined by an immigrant inspector while in a penitentiary serving a sentence (reduced from 10 to 2 years) upon conviction under the espionage act for having during the war distributed a Socialist leaflet entitled "The Price We Pay." At that examination he had no counsel. When asked if he wished one he replied in the negative. Considering, however, that he was at the time in a prison far distant from his home, I opened his case for rehearing in order to make the offer of right to counsel a substantial instead of a perfunctory offer. The record of both hearings is now before me.

At the first hearing the alien testified that he was not an anarchist; that he did not know what an anarchist was until accused of being one, whereupon he had read about it and saw no objections to anarchists or their principles; that he was never identified with an anarchistic organization; that he had publicly said, when sentenced under the espionage law, that he hoped when released from the penitentiary he would find the red flag waving over the American flag, and that he still hoped so, but that he would not call that anarchy, because the red flag is an international emblem.

At his second examination the alien testified that he was not an anarchist nor a believer in the principles of anarchy; that he was not acquainted with the subject and knew nothing about it; that he was a Socialist; that for the past eight years he had been and still was a member in good standing in the Socialist Party; that he is a believer in socialism; that he believes government is necessary for the conduct of human affairs; that it is his economic belief that society should be formed on the basis of the principles of socialism; that he is not opposed to the Government of the United States; that he is not in favor of the overthrow of the Government of the United States; that his expression of a wish to see the red flag wave over the United States flag was, in his own language, for these reasons: "I am an internationalist; the red flag is the national emblem" [evidently a slip of the tongue or a stenographer's error for "international emblem"]. "I didn't think it any more wrong to be an internationalist than was the United States in connection with the League of Nations"; that in saying the world should be organized on an international basis he didn't mean that the Government of the United States should be done away with, but that the people of the world should organize a world brotherhood; that as to flags, the American flag should be for the American people and the red flag for the international people; and that the only activities he has ever taken part in have been those of the Socialist Party.

Those statements of the alien are the only evidence in the case. There is nothing in the record by way of direct statement or inference to contradict them. It follows that if alien is to be deported it must be because those statements directly prove or indicate his guilt on one or more of the charges set out in the warrant of arrest. That they neither prove nor indicate that alien is an anarchist, which is one charge in the warrant, is too obvious for discussion. He can not be both an anarchist and a Socialist, since the former term denotes an antigovernmentalist and the latter a governmentalist—two directly opposite states of mind.

The same observation applies to the warrant charge that alien disbelieves in all organized government. Also, to the warrant charge that he advocates the overthrow of all forms of law. Likewise, to the warrant charge that he believes in the overthrow of all forms of law. The only remaining warrant charge is that he believes in the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States. This is not proved by his membership in the Socialist Party, nor by his activities in that party, nor by the war-time offense of which he was convicted and for which he has served the sentence imposed. The only possible basis for a conclusion that alien believes in overthrowing the Government of the United States by force and violence, which is the sole remaining warrant charge, is his declaration about the red flag and the American flag when he was sentenced. If his statement of what he meant by that declaration be true, the declaration implies nothing hostile to the Government of the United States. While the alien's utterance might excite popular denunciation, it is not enough, even without his explanatory statement, to justify a deliberate conclusion by any tribunal that he believes in the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence.

The alien came to the United States in 1911, when he was 19 years old. He applied for naturalization in 1914. He has been a glass cutter since he was 14 years old. Until his arrest under the espionage act he was a dues-paying member of the American Flint Glass Workers' Union and of the American Federation of Labor, as well as of the Socialist Party. Apart from his conviction under the espionage act, he appears to have been always a law-abiding resident.

The evidence does not sustain the charges in the warrant of arrest, and the warrant is therefore hereby canceled.

LOUIS F. POST,
Assistant Secretary.

Bosco was represented by Harry Weinberger. Our head governmental official was sympathetic. No one stood up for the Government in the final state of the Bosco proceedings.

Mr. Weinberger has written me a letter objecting to certain reflections on him in my remarks on this floor and in the report of the committee. The report says:

Weinberger has appeared in numerous cases for I. W. W.'s, anarchists, communists, and other brands of radicals, commonly calling themselves "Class-war prisoners," which means a radical arrested and charged with, or who has been convicted of, the crimes of treason, syndicalism, sedition, etc. Some aliens have been turned over to him in his custody as their attorney by the Department of Labor. At least one of these he has been unable to produce when called upon to do so.

I said something about Weinberger's law practice. I desire to do him no injustice. I do not know that his practice is chiefly in behalf of the Boscos, the Emma Goldmans, and the Berkmans or not. He says in his letter to me:

As far as I am concerned, my duty as an attorney has always been that when I take a man's case I take it whole-heartedly. I urge in his behalf everything that can be properly urged. I talk for him as he would talk for himself if he had my training, or if he had my knowledge of the law. That is my duty, and that is the law, and that is the Constitution.

Mr. Weinberger also says:

At times I also have criticized some of Mr. Post's decisions, and I do not approve of the new deportation policy of the United States, where men and women are deported for merely expressing opinions as to how society should be formed different from most of our beliefs, and in some cases for only holding opinions. As for me, if I were a public official, with the duty imposed upon me of carrying out the deportation policy as laid down in the present immigration laws, it being in violation of my conscience, I would resign immediately.

Bosco himself said:

I have no objections to anarchists or their principles, as the Constitution of the United States does not forbid anarchistic propaganda or anarchistic doctrines.

Weinberger worked strenuously for Bosco, and Bosco is free, along with Sam Crane, Enrique Magon, Dudinsky, Kulman, and about 2,000 others, who preach all shades of revolution.

Why have they gone free? Attorney General Palmer answers. Testifying before the House Rules Committee, he said:

It has become perfectly apparent that Mr. Post's course in all the deportation proceedings has been dictated by his own personal view that the deportation law is wrong rather than by any desire and intention to carry out the law as enacted by the Congress. By his self-willed and autocratic substitution of his mistaken personal viewpoint for the obligation of public law, by his habitually tender solicitude for social revolution and perverted sympathy for the criminal anarchists of the country, he has consistently deprived the people of the enforcement of a law of vital importance to their peace and safety. By his wholesale jail deliveries and his release of even self-confessed anarchists of the worst type, he has utterly nullified the purpose of the Congress in passing the deportation statute and has set at large among the people the very public enemies whom it was the desire and intention of the Congress to be rid of.

The records bear testimony to the truth of the Attorney General's charges, harsh as they are. While the Department of Justice hunts down dangerous aliens, the Department of Labor considers it its duty to protect them instead of the public. Even when it admits the unlawful character of the Communist Party, it finds ways to shelter individual alien communists. Thus the very persons against whom the people of the United States have a right to be protected have been allowed to continue their criminal propaganda.

In many cities dangerous aliens who have been released under the Assistant Secretary's hair-trigger decisions are being rearrested and convicted under State laws. In Seattle and San Francisco this has happened and only a day or two ago, in Waterbury, Conn., an attempt was made to destroy by dynamite the house of a manufacturer whose family and he were asleep in it at the time. There is not a doubt that an alien revolutionist was responsible for that crime. The superintendent of police at Waterbury is quoted in connection with the matter as follows:

Anarchists arrested by Department of Justice agents in the raids of last March have returned here. They are active in agitation and we have been compelled to keep them under surveillance. So far as I know not a single one of the 200 prisoners taken here in raids ever was deported. Many of them, including those I mentioned as back here, were released, after they got as far as Ellis Island, through rulings by Assistant Secretary Post.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it is intolerable that a necessary law should be continuously outraged and notorious enemies of the country be encouraged and supported by an official of the Government which they seek to overthrow. The private opinions of a public official should not be allowed to lead him into overruling and breaking the law which it is his duty to enforce.

I append an interesting table:

A Review of the Work and Accomplishments of the First and Second Sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. MONDELL,

OF WYOMING,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

MR. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the first regular session of the Sixty-sixth Congress has passed into history with a record of which its Members may well be proud and which the country will heartily approve.

The Congress met in extraordinary session May 19, 1919, so that a little more than a year has elapsed since the Congress first convened. In this period the Congress has considered and passed upon great questions other than the usual and ordinary problems of legislation, such as the treaty of Versailles and the peace resolution. The Congress has also considered and disposed of legislative problems of the highest importance and most far-reaching effect, which have been pending for years, such as the budget, the oil and coal land leasing act, and the water-power act. In addition to these have been the trying problems of construction and restoration, which have been met and solved by legislation, such as the railroad transportation act, the merchant marine shipping act, the Army reorganization act, and acts of like character.

In the field of progressive policy the Congress has considered and enacted such legislation as the act for a woman's bureau in the Department of Labor, the civil-service retirement act, and the act for the vocational rehabilitation of those injured in industry. In the matter of appropriations the Congress has been required to do practically two years' work in one, for it had laid upon it at the beginning of the special session the consideration and enactment of the eight great supply bills which it was the duty of the former Congress to enact, and which that Congress had failed to pass.

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS.

In the consideration of the appropriation bills it was the duty of the Congress to restore as rapidly as possible, in the face of departmental indifference or active opposition, a condition of normal and reasonable expenditure following a period of the most reckless extravagance, and this was done in the presence and in the consideration of departmental estimates of staggering proportions.

The duty of the Congress to curtail the volume of war-time expenditures, to effect a condition of economical administration, to bring expenditures within reasonable bounds and well within the national income, would have been difficult enough had it been undertaken with the aid and assistance of administrative agencies working toward that end, but, unfortunately, with a very few laudable exceptions, the bureaus and departments of the Government seemed united in a determined effort to continue expenditures in all lines in the most profligate manner, to retain thousands of unnecessary employees, to continue, even to enlarge and extend, activities wholly unnecessary, or at the best of questionable and doubtful value to the public.

In the pursuance of this policy I regret to have to say that many of the officials of the administration were neither accurate, informed, nor properly mindful of the truth in their arguments before committees in support of the estimates. The very best that can be said for the attitude of the officials who urged extravagant expenditures is that they may have spoken through ignorance rather than out of a deliberate purpose to mislead. I make this statement with regard to the attitude of departmental officials with regret, but with full knowledge that it can not be denied by anyone sufficiently familiar with the facts to have an opinion on the subject worthy of consideration.

In this condition of affairs it was utterly impossible for the Congress to effect as great a saving in certain lines as might have been effected with even the reasonable cooperation of the officials of the administration generally, and this particularly with regard to departmental employees and in the matter of the appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments.

It is probably true that the expenditure for the coming fiscal year for departmental employees in excess of those actually essential for the transaction of the Government business does not amount to a very great sum as compared with the sum total of appropriations. So much has been accomplished by the Congress in the face of the opposition of the departments in the reduction of the forces of Federal employees that I should not mention this matter at all were it not for the fact that the retention of unnecessary employees is one of those things that peculiarly illustrate the utter lack of regard for economy or for the businesslike handling of the Government's affairs on the part of the officials of the administration, with a few commendable exceptions.

THE RECORD OF ECONOMIES.

The Republican Sixty-sixth Congress took up its work volunteering a pledge of the closest scrutiny of estimates and of the greatest possible reduction in them consistent with the public welfare. That pledge has been gloriously redeemed, and in the face of the most united, determined, persistent pressure and demand for larger appropriations ever launched on legislative bodies by administrative and executive agencies. The detail of the savings of this Republican Congress below not only the estimates but the persistent demand of the administration, its departments and its bureaus, is highly interesting in its details, but it is even more interesting in the astounding fact that in a little more than one year during two sessions congressional appropriations for all purposes are $2,710,290,495.80 below the estimates and demands of the administration and its departments and bureaus for the same services.

It may, however, be urged that the Republican Congress is not entitled to credit for all of the great saving below the estimates in the first or special session of the Congress, inasmuch as the Democratic Sixty-fifth Congress had made considerable reductions below the estimates in the preparation of the eight supply bills which that Congress had considered and advanced to various stages of legislative procedure but had failed to enact. To be entirely frank we should, I think, base our claim for savings in the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress on the reduction we actually made in the eight supply bills as we passed them below the amount they carried as prepared and presented by the former Democratic Congress. This was the saving which I claimed on behalf of the Republican Congress in my statement of November 19, 1919, at the close of the special session. The sum which we thus saved by reducing the amounts which these eight supply bills carried below the amounts they had carried when they had been considered and had failed in the former Congress was $939,692,541.97.

SAVINGS OF THE SECOND SESSION.

The total estimates submitted by the administration for and during the second or regular session for all purposes, regular and special, including permanent annual appropriations and deficiencies, amounted to $6,334,312,929.46, while the sums appropriated and provided amount to $4,859,890,327.30, or a reduction below the estimates of $1,474,422,602.16. Adding to this sum $939,692,541.97, the saving of the first session, we have a grand total of $2,414,115,144.13 as the sum which this Republican Congress has saved by reducing the appropriations of the first session below the amounts the Democratic Sixty-fifth Congress proposed to appropriate for the same services and by reductions in the appropriations of the second session below the estimates of the administration.

We have just approved budget legislation, and I am hopeful of great benefits from such a system, but even a budget system of the best character that human ingenuity can devise would be of little value in saving the country from an administration so reckless in its estimates.

These tremendous economies of the Republican Congress have not been accomplished, let it be remembered, by any crude or bludgeon method of reduction. Every estimate has been carefully studied, every demand fairly weighed, every service fairly considered. Reductions have been made not in ignorance or recklessness, much less in a spirit of disregard for the needs of the public service, but with care, discrimination, and circumspection.

A PORKLESS CONGRESS.

Not only has the Sixty-sixth Congress made a remarkable record in the trimming of expenditures and the reduction of estimates, but its record is even more creditable in the fact that no appropriations have been made along lines and for purposes which the public has, with or without justification or reason, come to designate as "pork-barrel" appropriations. I am not one of those who subscribe to the notion that appropriations for public buildings, even in comparatively small towns, are necessarily improper or unwise, and under ordinary conditions and circumstances I believe a liberal public-building policy is justified.

Appropriations of that character, appropriations for expenditure in the districts of Members of Congress, appeal strongly to their constituents and are helpful to the Member, and therefore a Congress that can and does forego appropriations of this kind is certainly entitled to commendation as a Congress which places the general public interest far beyond local interest or personal advantage. This Congress has authorized no new public-building construction, and has only made appropriations for the continuation of public-building work under way as estimated to be essential by the Treasury Department.

While I represent one of the few States of the Union which never has items on river and harbor bills, I am not among those who minimize the value or necessity of river and harbor appropriations. We can not afford, even in times like these, to let up on the regular and steady development of our great harbors and waterways. Neither do I underestimate the value of the proper and reasonable improvement of the minor waterways of the country. In times like these, however, only that work should be carried on which is beyond question of value and importance to the commerce of the Nation, and this Congress has patriotically taken that view of the matter.

The Members of Congress have been willing to forego for the time their insistence upon local works and enterprises which they and their constituents believe are worthy, even though by so doing they run the risk of being charged with indifference or failure to insist upon local enterprises, and so we have a "porkless" river and harbor appropriation bill in the sense that it carries no new items or provisions of local expenditure. We believe we have, however, provided adequately for the works under way and for the projects of unquestionable value to general commerce. Beyond this the Congress, to its credit, has declined to go at this time when economy must be the watchword, and when the cost of development is excessive.

These two sessions of Congress have much to their credit, but nothing more creditable than the fact that the Congress has refused to authorize new expenditures which are not absolutely essential and has abstained from all legislation or appropriations of a character which, while appealing strongly to local interest and sentiment, has been viewed with a critical eye by the general public as "pork barrel" in character.

DETAIL OF APPROPRIATIONS OF THE FIRST SESSION.

In the speech which I delivered in the House on Wednesday, November 19, 1919, I gave in detail the saving which had been accomplished in the first or special session in the passage of the eight regular annual appropriation bills which the former Democratic Congress had failed to pass. With a view of affording ready reference to these figures in detail, and the statement I then made with regard to them, I insert them in my remarks at this point:

Also exclusive of $53,750,000 for emergency shipping fund carried in the amount of the sundry civil bill for the Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, as it passed the House.
[5] This amount does not include $45,044,500 carried in the bill making urgent deficiency appropriations for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and for the payment of pensions. Of this sum $42,615,000 was not estimated or considered at the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and $2,429,500 was included in the third deficiency bill at that session.

Net decrease, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, under Sixty-fifth Congress, third session..... $939,692,541.97

It will be noted that these savings are in the main in the Army, the Navy, and the sundry civil bill. In other words, in lines and items of expenditure for the establishments and purposes directly or indirectly connected with and affected by war operations. It has been the habit of our Democratic friends to claim that these enormous reductions and savings were due to the ending of the war and to the tremendous reduction of military activities. This claim is utterly without basis or foundation.

The estimates considered by the committees of the Sixty-fifth Congress in December, 1918; January, February, and March, 1919, were estimates made after the close of hostilities and the signing of the armistice, and were substantially the estimates that were considered by the Committee on Appropriations of the House in May. The savings on the bills above referred to, in round figures, were as follows:

Army appropriation bill..... $468,175,189.48
Navy appropriation bill..... 208,611,283.00
Sundry civil appropriation bill..... 246,011,651.30

Not only were there no substantial reductions in the estimates considered by the Republicans in May below those considered by the Democrats in January, February, and March, and no suggestions on the part of the administration that they could get along with lesser sums, but during the consideration of these bills by the House and Senate in May and June, and up to the last moment before final action on them, the officials of the administration were strenuously endeavoring to secure increases in practically the amount of the reductions made by the Republican Congress.

For the benefit of those who desire detailed information as to the saving in the appropriations as actually made, as compared with the estimates of the sums needed as submitted by the administration, I am inserting in the RECORD a detailed statement showing an actual saving in appropriations as compared with the estimates of $1,685,867,893.64, and which is as follows:

Comparison of the amounts of the appropriation bills as agreed upon, with amounts asked for and considered during the Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.

Title of act.	Amounts as agreed upon, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.	Amounts asked for and considered, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.	Decrease of amounts agreed upon, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, under amounts asked for and considered, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.

Sundry civil	605,160,207.95	964,591,556.25	359,431,348.30
Railroad deficiency	750,000,000.00	1,200,000,000.00	450,000,000.00
Third deficiency	24,305,929.40	[1] 42,764,678.94	18,458,749.54
War-risk insurance and pension deficiency	45,044,500.00	45,044,500.00	.....
Expenses incident to first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress	385,720.00	385,720.00	.....
Total	2,873,713,652.76	4,559,581,546.40	1,685,867,893.64

[1] This amount does not include $45,044,500, estimated in connection with the bill making urgent deficiency appropriations for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and for the payment of pensions. Of this sum, $42,615,000 was not estimated at the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and therefore not included in the total of $42,764,678.94, which sum does include $2,429,500 for above-named purposes.

Let me again emphasize the fact that these estimates were not predicated on war conditions; they were submitted after the signing of the armistice; and that, therefore, the saving which was made below these estimates was not, as gentlemen on the Democratic side have claimed, a saving made possible by changed conditions. Neither the conditions nor the estimates had appreciably changed between January, February, and March, when the Democratic Congress considered the bills, and May and June, when the Republican Congress considered them.

Neither were these savings due to a failure to provide for the reasonable needs of the Government in its essential activities. Nearly five months have passed since these appropriations became available, and no necessary activity of the Government has been unduly or injuriously curtailed. No substantial or well-founded claim has been made that the appropriations will not be sufficient for the period for which they were made. All this being true, the fact is that the special session has saved to the American people approximately $940,000,000 below the appropriations actually proposed by its predecessor and more than one and three-quarter billions below the estimates on which the appropriation bills were based.

As I have stated, in the passage of these bills the Republican Congress effected a saving of $939,692,541.97 below the sums carried in the same bills which failed in the closing days of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and a saving of $1,685,867,893.64 below the estimates of the departments for the services provided for in those bills.

APPROPRIATIONS OF THE REGULAR SESSION.

At the beginning of the present regular session of the Congress I called attention to the enormous sum of the estimates presented by the departments in the Book of Estimates and to the menace which these enormous estimates presented in view of their sum total as compared with the estimates of revenue. I then stated that, in my opinion, it was essential that we reduce these estimates, if possible, in the sum of at least a billion and a quarter.

I realized then what an undertaking it was to attempt to reduce estimates in the enormous sum referred to without doing injury to necessary, proper, and legitimate public services, particularly in view of the fact that conditions were such that in the case of some of the services for which these estimates were made, notably the Post Office, pensions, appropriations for insurance and compensation, hospital treatment and vocational training of disabled veterans of the World War, for the families of deceased veterans of that war, and for increased compensation for the personnel of the civil and military establishments, it would be necessary to add to these bills very large sums not contained in the estimates. And yet I believed it could be accomplished.

Had I then realized how large these necessary additions to the appropriations would be, I should not have dared to prophesy such a net reduction. Notwithstanding these great and necessary expenditures not included in the estimates but for purposes for which estimates were made, the Congress has more than accomplished the great reduction in the estimates which I suggested, and has succeeded in trimming the appropriations for the services provided for in the regular estimates carried in the Book of Estimates by $1,384,917,650.39, and in reducing the total of the appropriations, as I have heretofore stated, in the enormous sum of $1,474,422,602.16 below the total estimates for the session.

The following is a detailed statement of the appropriations for the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress prepared by Mr. Good, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. This statement includes not only the appropriations contained in the regular annual appropriation bills but also permanent annual and miscellaneous appropriations, as well as the appropriations to cover deficiencies for the fiscal year 1920 and prior years.

[1] The estimates of permanent annual appropriations have been reduced from $1,425,407,752.29 to $1,363,768,980.29 or by $31,638,772. This reduction is due to a revision by the Treasury Department of the estimates for interest on the public debt and the amount for the sinking fund.

[2] This amount represents definite and indefinite appropriations in the transportation act, 1920, for which no formal estimates were submitted.

[3] This sum includes estimated amount of $2,500,000 to cover appropriations made in miscellaneous public and private acts; $35,000,000 estimated on account of increased compensation to certain Government employees at the rate of $240 per annum; $35,000,000 estimated on account of increases in salaries to employees of the Postal Service under the postal reclassification act; and $725,000,000 in the transportation act as follows: $300,000,000 for new loans to carriers, $200,000,000 on account of Federal control of railroads, $200,000,000 estimated to pay the six months' guaranty to carriers, and $25,000,000 estimated on account of payments to the "short-line" railroads.

SUM TOTAL OF SAVINGS.

The sum total of the savings of the two sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress may be graphically presented as follows:

Saving in amount appropriated in eight regular supply bills passed at the first session below sums carried in same bills which failed in Sixty-fifth Congress	$939,692,541.97
Saving in total appropriations for second session below amount of total estimates	1,474,422,602.16
Grand total of savings	2,414,115,144.13

TRYING TO BELITTLE THE REDUCTIONS.

Our Democratic friends, amazed at the very great reductions which have been made in the appropriations as compared with the estimates, have attempted to belittle these reductions, enormous as they are, by calling attention to the sum total of the appropriations and obligations of the Government, notwithstanding the very great reductions effected.

It is true that the expenditures for the fiscal year which closes the last of this month have been heavy. It is equally true they would have been nearly a billion dollars greater except for the saving compelled by reductions made in the estimates for the eight regular appropriation bills which the Republican Congress passed. The total expenditures for the fiscal year, according to the most recent figures available, will amount to approximately $6,500,000,000, exclusive of transactions affecting the principal of the public debt. The Republican Congress had no control whatever over that vast expenditure by the executive departments and participated in appropriating for it only to the extent of the amounts carried in the eight appropriation bills heretofore referred to and aggregating $2,828,283,432.76. In the passage of those bills, however, nearly a billion dollars was saved, as I have stated.

Of the sum total of expenditures more than three and one-half billions were swallowed up in the cost of the Government operation of the railroads, in settling war contracts, and in the payment of $450,000,000 in loans to the Allies, which it is presumed were contracted for before the signing of the armistice.

REPUBLICAN SAVING REFLECTED IN PRESENT CONDITION OF TREASURY.

In the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1919 was an estimate of receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, which indicated a probable excess of expenditures other than those connected with the principal of the public debt over receipts, except those from public debt operations, of approximately a billion dollars. In other words, a deficit of approximately a billion dollars in the ordinary transactions of the Government was the Treasury estimate for the fiscal year. On June 10 Secretary of the Treasury Houston gave out a statement as to the state of the finances, in which, referring to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, he said "the completed fiscal year's operation should show little, if any, deficit, the Government having about balanced its budget, current receipts against current disbursements, for the first full year after fighting stopped." Here we have reflected in official statement the actual saving of the Republican Congress. A billion dollars of deficit in the year's operations was the official estimate before the Congress had clipped a billion dollars from the eight appropriation bills, and now we have official assurance that the ordinary revenues of the year will meet the ordinary expenditures. The saving effected is thus demonstrated by the condition of the Treasury.

EFFECT OF SAVING IN APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE FISCAL YEAR 1921.

As I have heretofore stated, the total appropriations made during the session that has just closed, including all permanent annual and miscellaneous appropriations for 1921, as well as the deficiency appropriations for the fiscal year 1920 and prior fiscal years, amount to $4,859,890,327.30, and I shall refer to this figure later in utilizing the statement of classification of appropriations made by Mr. GOOD, of Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and published in the RECORD of Monday, June 14, 1920. In order, however, to arrive at the actual sum of the appropriations, regular, permanent annual, and miscellaneous, for and on behalf of the fiscal year 1921 and chargeable to that year, it will be necessary to subtract from the above sum the deficiency appropriations made during the session just closed, amounting to $486,495,048.23. Subtracting this sum of deficiency appropriations for 1920 and prior fiscal years from the above total we have the sum of $4,373,395,279.07 as the total of the appropriations, regular, permanent annual, and miscellaneous, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921—the coming fiscal year.

It is interesting to compare the above total appropriations for the fiscal year 1921 with the total estimated expenditures for like purposes for the fiscal year 1920 just closing. That total, it will be remembered, is estimated at approximately $6,500,000,000, and subtracting the appropriations of $4,373,395,279.07 for 1921 from this estimate of expenditure for 1920, we have a saving of $2,126,604,720.93 in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1921 below the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30 this year. Of this reduction in the amount made available for the next fiscal year below the amount which will be spent the present fiscal year $1,474,422,602.16 is directly traceable to the reductions which have been made, as I have heretofore stated, in the appropriations for 1921 below the amount of the estimates.

TREASURY STATEMENT AS TO RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES, FISCAL YEAR 1921.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1919, heretofore referred to, contains an estimate of receipts for the fiscal year 1921, exclusive of those arising out of the public debt, of $5,420,000,000. A more recent estimate is $5,490,000,000. I prefer to take the more conservative estimate. Deducting the total of the appropriations for the fiscal year, amounting to $4,373,395,279.07, from this total of estimated revenues we have the goodly sum of $1,146,604,720.93 as a conservative estimate of the total income of the fiscal year 1921 over and above the total expenditures for the same period. It may be urged that in this estimate we are not taking into account possible deficiencies. All possible deficiencies should be more than provided for by the $70,000,000 of difference between the Treasury's estimate of 1921 receipts made last fall, which I have used, and their larger and more recent estimate to which I have referred.

It is interesting to note that the estimate above made of $1,146,604,720.93 as the excess of income over outlay in the fiscal year 1921 is about $328,000,000 less than the actual reduction in the appropriations for 1921 below the estimates, and this fact serves to clearly illustrate not only the vast sum but the direct beneficial effect of these reductions. According to the Treasury's own statements, had it not been for the vast cuts made in the estimates we should be facing not a surplus of over $1,100,000,000 for the coming fiscal year but a deficit in excess of $1,400,000,000. It is interesting and cheering to note the latest utterances of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to this matter contained in his statement of June 10, to which reference has been made, as follows:

> During the coming fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1920, the Treasury expects, though it is impossible to state positively, that there will be a further reduction of both gross debt and floating debt in the first two quarters, and, unless additional burdens should be imposed by future legislation, that there will be a very important reduction in the last two quarters.

While the Secretary is careful not to use exact figures, he is fully justified in his statement "that there will be a very important reduction in the public debt during the coming fiscal year."

DANGER IN THE SITUATION.

We must not, however, lose sight of the fact that the President vetoed the resolution repealing the war laws and that therefore there still remains in the hands of the President extraordinary power over expenditures not embraced in or contemplated by the ordinary estimates and appropriations. The Secretary of the Treasury, in the paragraph that I have just quoted, speaks of reductions of "both gross debt and floating debt." I trust the Secretary does not have in mind the reduction of the bonded debt through purchases out of current revenues or otherwise. The reductions in the debt should be wholly in the floating debt—the war hangover—on which we are paying interest at the rate of 5½ to 6 per cent and the existence of which is a constant menace.

I assume that there will be no possible excuse for further foreign loans or for other extraordinary and unusual expenditures not contemplated by Congress in the making of the appropriations and yet possible under some of the war powers which the President has refused to surrender. Here lies the danger of the situation, a danger real imminent and only to be avoided by having the constant light of publicity on all governmental operations, a thing which, unfortunately, it is very difficult to accomplish, notwithstanding the President's proclaimed approval of "pitiless publicity," an approval which is a bitter mockery in the face of the impenetrable secrecy which has surrounded so many important transactions under this administration.

PURPOSES FOR WHICH APPROPRIATIONS WERE MADE.

I am under obligations to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], for a statement contained in his remarks of Saturday, June 5, printed in the RECORD of June 14, classifying the appropriations of the late session of the Congress so as to show the principal objects for which appropriations were made. In his classification Mr. GOOD uses the sum total of all appropriations of the recent session, including not only regular, permanent, annual, and miscellaneous, but deficiency appropriations for 1920 and prior fiscal years as well. By so doing he gives a grand total, $486,495,048.23, in excess of the appropriations actually chargeable to 1921, and this should be borne in mind. Mr. GOOD's table is as follows:

A. Appropriations incident mainly to past wars:
1. Soldiers and sailors of the war with Germany for compensation for death and disability, vocational training, hospital treatment, and return of remains from France	$293,168,400.00
2. Pensions incident to Mexican War, Civil War, Spanish-American War, and on account of regular Military and Naval Establishments	279,150,000.00
3. Interest on the public debt	980,000,000.00
4. Sinking fund; indefinite appropriation for the retirement of Liberty bonds and Victory notes, etc	260,800,000.00
5. Federal operation and control of transportation systems and expenses incident to termination of Federal control	1,025,000,000.00
		$2,838,118,400.00
B. Appropriations incident to present national defense:
1. Military Establishment	$418,232,382.57
2. Naval Establishment	437,724,580.00
		855,956,962.57

C. Appropriations incident to civil functions of government:
1. Postal Service	$497,575,190.00
2. Appropriations for all other services of the Govment not enumerated	481,744,726.50
		$979,319,916.50
D. Deficiency appropriations: For the fiscal year 1920 (excluding $300,000,000 for Federal control of railroads and including $85,000,000 for war-risk insurance compensation, $23,000,000 for vocational rehabilitation of soldiers and sailors, $13,166,187 for care of war-risk patients, and $14,000,000 for payment of deficit on account of Federal operation of telegraph and telephone lines)		186,495,048.23
Grand total		4,859,890,327.30

APPROPRIATIONS ON ACCOUNT OF WARS.

This classification is exceedingly interesting as illustrating the objects and purposes of the appropriations and the extent to which the great volume of appropriations compared with prewar appropriations is due to past wars, and especially the recent war with Germany. The public generally does not, in my opinion, have a clear idea of the liberality with which provision has been made for the injured and incapacitated soldiers of the war with Germany, not only in the matter of compensation but in vocational training and hospital treatment and for the widows and families of those who gave their lives for civilization in that Great War. The total for the coming year, a total which is likely to be increased rather than decreased, is over $293,000,000.

The public has shown its appreciation of its defenders by again increasing the pensions for soldiers of former wars until for the coming fiscal year the appropriations for veterans of the Mexican, Spanish, Indian, and Civil Wars amount to approximately $280,000,000.

INTEREST AND SINKING FUND, NATIONAL DEBT.

Those who imagine that we can at once, or ultimately, return to anything like prewar appropriations should take counsel of the fact that the interest on the public debt the coming fiscal year will amount to nine hundred and eighty millions and the payment to the sinking fund toward the extinction of that debt $260,000,000, or a total payment on account of the public debt alone of $1,240,000,000. Our obligations on account of the public debt alone amount therefore to more than our total annual national expenditure prior to the war. It is true that nearly five hundred millions of this annual charge is for interest on the sum of the foreign loans, interest that ought to be carried by our creditors rather than by ourselves, but for the present at least and for the next two or three years, under the arrangement made by the Treasury, we must bear this burden, assured of the fact that a new Republican administration will not further burden the American people for the benefit of foreign creditors, and that eventually these foreign creditors will meet at least the interest on their obligations.

COST OF GOVERNMENT OPERATION OF RAILWAYS.

The statement above referred to gives as the sum of the appropriations of the late session incident to Federal operation of transportation systems and the termination of that operation the sum of $1,025,000,000. This staggering sum is an unpleasant reminder of the cost to the taxpayer of the luxury of Federal operation of railroads.

It may be that it was necessary to take over the transportation systems of the country to aid in winning the war, but I doubt it. I believe that had the railways remained in private control and been granted relief from certain restrictions in the matter of agreement and operation a better result would have been secured, better service obtained, and hundreds of millions saved to the taxpayer. But it must be admitted that this is a question of opinion not susceptible of demonstration.

This we do know, however, that under Government operation we had curtailed an unsatisfactory service at great cost; that the taxpayers were compelled to pay vast sums, the greater proportion of which will be a permanent loss; and that the roads were returned to their owners with their motive power and rolling stock depleted and out of repair and their roadbeds and facilities in a condition rendering it well-nigh impossible for them to adequately care for the transportation business of the country.

It should be borne in mind that, in addition to the sum above referred to, we have heretofore appropriated $1,250,000,000 on account of the railroads under Federal control, making the total appropriations for such purposes $2,275,000,000. Just how much of this is a permanent loss to the taxpayer it is impossible at this time to determine with absolute accuracy, as the sum depends largely upon the ultimate value of certain railroad securities held by the Government and the net cost of the six months' guaranty on the return of the roads. I am of the opinion that $1,200,000,000 is a most conservative estimate of the actual ultimate cash loss to the taxpayers and the Government through the Federal operation of the railways.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The original and supplemental estimates for the national defense, including the Army and Navy and fortifications, total $1,748,358,604.80, while the sums finally approved by Congress amount to $844,671,381; Army, $392,558,365; Navy, $433,279,574; fortifications, $18,833,442. In my opinion the sum total for these defense services is greater than it ought to be, but in justice to the action of Congress it may be said that, considering the magnitude of the estimates and the unyielding attitude of the Secretaries of War and Navy in defense of them, Congress could scarcely have made smaller appropriations without wholly discrediting the heads of those services. In view of the constant insistence and pressure on Congress from every official source and from every individual or agency that could be reached or influenced by the departments, and the volumes of alleged facts and figures with which the demands were bolstered up, the Congress would not, perhaps, have been justified in appropriating lesser sums. The demands denied by committees of the House were presented in enlarged and augmented sums and with increased insistency to committees of the Senate, with the result that the Congress did the best it could under the present administration of affairs.

There is a healthy sentiment in the country for a first-class Navy of goodly proportions and for an Army of reasonable size, trained, equipped, and supplied thoroughly, completely, and abundantly, but there is also a demand in the country that these services shall be economically administered, and there is no hope for that without a change of administrative control. An Army and Navy which meets the expectations of the American people in size and character must be maintained, but under proper administration it can be maintained for much less than the appropriations which the present administration has demanded—for less even than the appropriations which have been made, which are below the estimates and demands of the administration in the stupendous sum of $903,687,223.80.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CIVIL FUNCTIONS OF GOVERNMENT.

The appropriations for the Postal Service are greatly increased, due to the growth of the service and to the very considerable increases made in the pay of postal employees. There have been three increases in the pay of the employees of the Postal Service since the war began amounting in the aggregate to $115,000,000 above former pay. It is true that there has been some complaint that the postal employees were not given as large an increase as they should have had in connection with the recent reclassification in which an increase of $40,000,000 in pay was granted. The fact is, however, that both in amount and percentage the postal employees have received larger increases in pay since the beginning of the war than any other class of public employees except those in certain mechanical employments.

It is the opinion of those best informed that the pay as now fixed is not only reasonable but, compared with other classes of Government employment, quite liberal. The total cost of the Postal Service has increased from $315,000,000 in 1916 to approximately $500,000,000 in 1921. The appropriations of the recent session for all civil functions of the Government other than the Postal Service amount to approximately $482,000,000—a small sum compared with the vast total—less than one-half billion out of a grand total approaching five billions.

Let him who is disposed to criticize the appropriations point out where they could have been greatly reduced. Certainly no one will begrudge the three hundred millions on behalf of the soldiers and sailors of the war with Germany, their widows and dependents; no one will begrudge the approximately two hundred and eighty millions for pensions to the veterans of the Civil, the Spanish, and the Mexican Wars. The interest on the public debt must be paid and the sinking fund provided for if we are to keep faith with the Nation's creditors and maintain the national credit. No part of the appropriations of nearly a half billion dollars for the post-office establishment could be cut out unless we reduce the pay of employees, which no one will propose to do. As to the half billion for the various civil services of the Government provided for in the Agricultural, the Indian, the District of Columbia, the legislative, executive, and judicial, the river and harbor, and the sundry civil bills, it could not have been reduced further without imperiling important public services.

This Republican Congress is in no wise responsible for the expenses growing out of the taking over of the railways by the Government and those incident and essential to the return of the roads to their owners. Except for the return of the roads to private management and control, the total outlay on their behalf during the fiscal year would have been very much greater.

WHERE REDUCTIONS CAN BE MADE IN THE FUTURE.

We can not expect immediate reductions in the expenditures on behalf of the soldiers of the Great War, their widows and dependents, or those for pensions for the soldiers of other wars. We can not look forward to a reduction in the interest charge on the national debt until the present arrangement of the Treasury with our foreign creditors shall expire and we shall begin to receive interest on the sums they owe us. The appropriations for the sinking fund must continue. In my opinion there can be a very considerable reduction in the total appropriations for the national defense in the fiscal year 1922, and by that time we shall be entirely relieved, let us hope, of appropriations on account of Federal operation and control of transportation systems. We shall also be able to make considerable saving by the further reduction of the number of Federal employees. The principal reductions in appropriations for the immediate future must come, therefore, from relief from expenditures growing out of Government railway operation, from a reduction of the cost of our defense establishments, and from a reduction in the number of Federal employees and a more efficient public service. Our appropriations for the civil and constructive activities of the Government will somewhat increase rather than decrease, so that balancing the probable increases with the probable decreases we may hope that as we have reduced the appropriations for 1921 below the estimated expenditures for 1920 by approximately $1,150,000,000, we may be able to further reduce the appropriations and expenditures for 1922 below those of 1921 by upward of a billion dollars.

THE REDUCTION OF TAXATION AND THE PRESIDENT'S ATTITUDE.

No President in American history has, everything considered, had so much reason to approve and appreciate the attitude of Congress as President Wilson. During the period of the war practically every suggestion and request made by him was promptly carried out and complied with. Requests for power and authority of the most extraordinary character and far-reaching effect were promptly granted. Estimates of his departments in staggering and, as it has since transpired, largely excessive sums were promptly appropriated. The Republican minority, even more than the Democratic majority, expressed and registered its patriotic purpose in promptly and generously supporting the President and his administration in every line and purpose of legislation and appropriation. And notwithstanding all this the President was ungracious and inconsiderate enough—partisan enough—to issue an appeal to the country for a Democratic Congress. The country's answer to this amazing partisan appeal of the President was prompt and emphatic, and the Sixty-sixth Congress opened with a Republican majority in both branches—a goodly Republican majority in the House, a bare and precarious Republican majority in the Senate.

The majority of the Senate did not approve, as the majority of the country does not, the surrender of American sovereignty with which, in contemptuous disregard of the opinions of the country and the Senate, the President had decorated the treaty of peace. The Senate, true to American traditions, refused to substitute the Constitution of the United States for the constitution of the League of Nations—to subordinate republican nationalism for a mixed and monarchial internationalism. The Senate was within its rights, but the President, declining to recognize the constitutional rights of the Senate, has assumed an attitude toward the Republican Congress even more critical than the domineering and contemptuous attitude he maintained toward the Democratic Congress.

In the main, and almost without exception, the public attitude and utterances of Republicans in the House toward the President have been respectful—respectful to the high office, notwithstanding the attitude and utterances of the incumbent. Certain Democratic Members have from time to time attempted to create the impression that the President had been severely criticized and, as they put it, "abused" by Republicans, but their assertions reflected the utterances of the Democratic cloakroom rather than those of Republican Members of Congress. When the President's acts and attitude are considered, the attitude and utterances of Republican Members of Congress have been remarkably considerate of the President.

In view of these facts the telegram of the President relative to the Congress to certain railroad men on the day that Congress adjourned was a contemptible exhibition of petulant temper and churlish lack of appreciation of the consideration due a coordinate branch of the Government. Perhaps the President is not to be blamed for being irritable and ill tempered over the utter failure of the officials of his administration to apply energetically, intelligently, or effectively the vast powers conferred upon the President by war laws for the punishment of profiteers and the prevention of practices which increase the cost of living. But the President will not get far in attempting to place upon the legislative body, which has conferred upon him and his officers autocratic power, the responsibility for the utter failure of the administration to exercise those powers effectively.

The Congress has granted full authority and made liberal appropriations; further than that the legislative authority can not go. The miserable failure to effectively enforce the laws can not be shifted from the officials of the administration. In the case of sugar, for instance, the extraordinary price and the amazing profits are, in fact, directly due to acts of omission on the part of the President and of commission on the part of the Attorney General.

THE PRESIDENT PROPOSED "REVISION."

I am particularly interested, however, in what the President had to say in that telegram about the revision of the tax laws, which laws he says "in their present form are indirectly responsible in part for the high cost of living." To what extent the present Democratic tax laws are responsible for the high cost of living I do not know, but I do know that warning was given of the injurious effect of certain of those laws when enacted. The President complains because there have not been "revisions." What are the revisions which have been suggested and to which the President refers? They are proposals to reduce the taxes on exorbitant profits and to place them instead on normal incomes and ordinary business operations.

The Republican Congress will, when in complete control of the situation, revise and modify the crude and inequitable tax laws the Democrats have placed upon the statute books. But they will not take taxes from extraordinary and unusual profits and shift them to ordinary and normal operations, incomes, and profits. We shall repeal the obnoxious taxes rather than shift the burden of them to other classes of business and income. The President himself would be the very first to use to partisan advantage the absurd and indefensible "revision" which he indorses.

The Democratic Sixty-fifth Congress left us on June 30, 1919, a legacy of nearly three and one-quarter billions of war overhang, of floating unbonded indebtedness, in addition to the enormous volume of bonded debt. This overhang has been a continual menace to the financial stability of the country, a continuously disturbing factor in the field of finance. The presence of this enormous floating debt and the periodical transactions of the Treasury in its short-time renewals has tended to disturb and unsettle all classes of financial operations, national and private; has tended to reduce the value of all securities and to increase interest rates until the Government is now paying 6 per cent on its one-year notes.

Thanks to the heroic action of the Republican majority in the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress in cutting down appropriations nearly a billion dollars, we shall pass through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, without any increase of debt, floating or bonded; in fact, with some decrease. We have placed the Government in the first year of our control of Congress in the way of paying its obligations with its income. Furthermore, we have so greatly reduced the appropriations below the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, that if all goes well with the receipts—if the President does not take advantage of the war powers, which through veto he has declined to relinquish, in a way to increase expenditures beyond those contemplated by the Congress—the fiscal year will witness the payment of all Government expenditures out of the current revenue and enough to spare to reduce by a billion to a billion and a quarter the menacing 6 per cent floating debt. And thus we come within reaching distance not of "revision" alone but of reduction of the burdens of taxation.

As Democratic suggestions, official and unofficial, of tax "revision" by shifting the burden from excess and enormous profits and incomes to small and normal incomes and profits and ordinary business operations are at best a gruesome joke, so suggestions from the same sources of the reduction of the sum total of Government income while the estimates were staggering, the expenditures excessive, and the war overhang menacing are grimly sardonic, calculated only for partisan purposes and to catch the unwary, thoughtless, and unsophisticated.

REDUCTION OF TAX BURDENS IN SIGHT.

While in their operation the excess profits and other taxes as interpreted and administered have been inequitable and even confiscatory, in some cases the more indefensible effects of the law have been due more to blundering administration than to the law itself, and the shifting of burdens from large incomes and profits to those that are ordinary and normal is, of course, as impossible as it would be improper. Relief should come where it is possible to afford it by repealing inequitable and obnoxious taxes rather than by shifting burdens by so-called "revision." Even the lifting of those tax burdens that are the most vexatious to business is hardly practical so long as the Nation hawks its short-time notes in the money market and its outlay outruns its income. The first thing the Republican Congress was called upon to do was to demonstrate its ability and determination to reduce expenditures. That has been gloriously accomplished, and the new session which meets in December, if all goes well in the meantime, should find a condition of the Treasury and the finances justifying the early consideration of measures of real and permanent relief from excessive and obnoxious tax burdens. We have accomplished the essential preliminaries; we have cleared the way; we have brought expenditures within income; we have reduced the appropriations for the next year to an extent making possible a well-nigh 50 per cent reduction in the war overhang. We shall enter the new session in December, and the new Congress in March, with the way cleared for a considerable reduction of the tax burdens; and, of course, the first burdens to be lifted should be those which most hamper business and those that have proven most inequitable.

THE IMPORTANT AND OUTSTANDING LEGISLATION OF THE CONGRESS.

The work of a Congress, like that of a housewife, may be well said never to be done. If a legislative body were in session continuously and continuously diligent, the time would never come when there were not problems of more or less importance unsolved. The hour would never arrive when there were not questions of principle or policy pending. Beyond all question, there would never be a time when some one and possibly some considerable number of people were not demanding for selfish, personal, political, or perfectly laudible purposes the consideration of some proposal of legislation.

The proper test of the work of a legislative body is to be found first in the disposition it has made of the regular and routine work which comes before it and which must be disposed of in order to keep the institutions of Government properly and adequately functioning. Judged from this standard, the work of the two sessions of the Sixty-sixth Congress, now passing into history, can not be successfully challenged even by its most carping and prejudiced critics. Everything has been done, and well done, essential to meet the obligations of Government and to maintain public institutions and services, and it has been done with vast saving and without improper curtailment. The legislation essential to meet changed conditions has been provided, so far as it is possible to enact such legislation under present unsettled conditions. With some minor exceptions, for which the Republican majority is in no wise responsible, there are no loose ends anywhere in the provisions for the care, protection, and functioning of the public business.

Another test is to be found in the manner in which the assumed and self-appointed tasks, duties, and obligations of responsible majorities have been met and discharged. Viewed from this standpoint the work of the sessions of this Congress has been carried on and performed in a manner entitling the Congress to the very highest commendation of the American people. Without exception the program of legislation proposed and announced by the Republican majority of the House at the beginning of the special session has been carried forward either to triumphant completion or to such a point in legislative procedure as to insure the complete carrying out of the program before the close of the Congress.

With the exception of a few matters on which the lack of an actual Republican majority in the Senate has prevented final action the program has been carried out to a degree and with a perfection which, at the beginning of the Congress, scarcely seemed possible, while added to this program have been a number of important measures not considered or referred to in the statement that formed that basis of our legislative program at the beginning of the Congress. I feel fully justified in applying to the work of the Sixty-sixth Congress up to this time, in substance, the language I used at the close of the special session: "Whether we view the work of this Congress from the standpoint of economy in appropriations, forward-looking constructive legislation, or diligent continuous attention to the public business, it can be truthfully said that no Congress in American history has more courageously, consistently, continuously, and successfully addressed itself to, or more faithfully performed and discharged, the duties and responsibilities placed upon it than the Sixty-sixth Congress of the United States up to this time."

As I have said, the work of a Congress is never done, and this Congress will no more escape cheap and carping criticism that it has not done and performed and completed every proposed, suggested, or imaginable proposition or purpose than other Congresses have. In that regard, from the viewpoint of an unreasonable and unfair opposition, it will always be a matter of being "damned if you do and damned if you don't." But even the most prejudiced, jaundiced, and unreasonable critics can charge us with no sins of commission or omission of sufficient magnitude to change the favorable judgment of the American people on our work.

THE RESPONSIBILITY IS OURS.

As Republicans we must and do assume the responsibility for this Congress. We shall not plead the baby act or endeavor to lay upon the opposition the responsibility for anything that we have done or failed to do, and yet it is entirely proper to remind the country that we do not have a working majority in the Senate; in fact, a majority of one or even two in numbers by classification is so narrow that under the rules of that body and the conditions certain to exist under those circumstances this can not be claimed to be, and is not, in fact, a majority in the case of a real definite, determined legislative show-down.

During practically all of the special session, and a considerable portion of the regular session as well, the time of the Senate has been occupied with the consideration of the treaty of Versailles, and in view of that fact the amount of legislation of an important character, involving much study and careful consideration and with regard to which there were sharp differences of opinion, that has been disposed of becomes the more remarkable.

THE SENATE SAVED THE COUNTRY.

Under the Constitution the Senate has equal responsibility with the President in the making of treaties, and yet in the negotiation of perhaps the most important treaty in the world's history the advice of the Senate was not sought and apparently was not desired and the concurrence of the Senate in the result, including a complete reversal of national policy and a surrender and curtailment of national sovereignty, was demanded by the Executive.

The Senate of the United States has, as a body and an institution, one time and another, been under the fire of severe criticism, but its attitude of courageous refusal to surrender the views and convictions of its Members, and the independence and sovereignty of the Nation at the behest of the Executive, places the Nation and the world under profound obligations to those Members of the Senate who declined to become the recording instruments of the Executive mandate.

THE PEACE RESOLUTION.

The President having defeated the ratification of the treaty of Versailles by influencing Democratic Senators against joining the majority for its ratification with proper reservations, it became necessary for the Congress to attempt to restore conditions of official peace, to reestablish normal conditions of intercourse with the nations of the world, and to set in motion the repeal of war-time laws and the shortening of the Executive power through a resolution properly drawn to accomplish those purposes.

The adoption of the peace resolution with practically a solid Republican vote, and the attempt by this same vote to override the President's veto, stands among the most important and patriotic acts of the Republican majority. However the minority may endeavor to explain or apologize for their failure to support this resolution, they can never persuade the American people that they are in favor of a return to a status of peace, the restoration of normal conditions, the curtailment of the President's extraordinary powers, in view of their action on this measure. The President himself thought so little of the argument of unconstitutionality which had been raised against the resolution that he entirely ignored it in his message, leaving the Members of his party in the Congress without even a reasonable excuse for their failure to join the Republican majority in the establishment of peace and the fixing of the date for the repeal of the war authority of the President.

THE LEGISLATION OF THE CONGRESS.

In my speech of November 19, 1919, at the close of the special session, to which I have heretofore referred, I gave a brief summary of the general legislation that had been enacted and placed upon the statute books during that session. It may not be amiss to insert that portion of the statement referred to at this point. It is as follows:

PARTIAL LIST OF THE GENERAL LEGISLATION OF THE FIRST (SPECIAL) SESSION OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

The return of the telephone, telegraph, and cable lines of the country to their owners.

The adoption of the woman-suffrage amendment.

The placing on the statute books of a complete and comprehensive national prohibition law.

The enactment of liberal provisions for vocational training and rehabilitation of wounded soldiers and sailors, and generous appropriations for the same.

The extension and enlargement of the food-control act with a view of preventing hoarding and profiteering, and with additional penalties for the violation of the statute.

Provision for additional travel pay for enlisted men discharged from the Regular Army.

Authorizing enlisted men who served in the World War to retain their uniforms and personal equipment.

Provision for the retention in the service until June 30 of officers in excess of the number regularly in the permanent establishment, thus enabling efficient volunteer officers to continue in the service.

Provision for reimbursement to the United States of approximately $400,000,000 advanced to provide motive power and rolling stock, through a corporation organized for that purpose on behalf of the railroads. This is the so-called equipment trust act.

Provision for the continuation of the control of the War Trade Board over the importation of dyes until January 15, 1920, with a view of preventing dumping of German dyes on the American market.

The incorporation of the American Legion.

Amendment to the war-risk insurance act increasing the allowance in certain classes of serious injury.

Repeal of the daylight-saving law.

Provision for additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service.

Legislation to facilitate the marketing of agricultural products, including live stock, by increasing amount which banks may loan on paper secured by such commodities.

Amendment to the Federal reserve act to enable national banks to assist in the facilitation of export trade.

Legislation making more stringent the restrictions and prohibitions surrounding the entry of aliens.

Provision for the completion of the railroad in Alaska.

Provision for liberal increased permanent appropriation for the American Printing House for the Blind.

Increase of pay of printers and pressmen in the Government Printing Office.

Provision for punishment for the transportation of stolen motor vehicles.

Provision for the reclamation of arid lands in Nevada.
